Fire forces Kelowna evacuation

12 Jewish families flee homes

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

KELOWNA, B.C. — Twelve of the 68 families that make up Kelowna's Jewish community were evacuated from their homes during the fires that have swept through the Okanagan Valley region since mid-August.

To date, the fires have destroyed close to 300 houses, but no homes belonging to members of the Jewish community have been touched by the flames.

The 12 families were evacuated from their homes in Crawford Park, Gallagher's Canyon and Upper Mission.

The RCMP gave them little more than an hour to pack their belongings, said Seymour Zidle, president of the Okanagan Jewish Community Centre (OJCC).

To cross the blockades, a special permit and identification are required. Only two return trips have been possible, both by bus and for a restricted period, Zidle said.

Advocacy groups to restructure

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jewish organizations across Canada have been meeting in recent months to discuss ways of implementing a broad range of measures that would enhance pro-Israel advocacy and counter the disturbing rise in anti-Semitic incidents.

Spearheaded by UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC), the meetings have focused on ways to reinforce the mandates of some organizations, clarify the roles of others and determine which organizations will see a boost in community funding, said Maxyne Finkelstein, executive vice-president of UIAFC. "A lot has to do with maximizing resources and how to spend more to do our jobs properly," she said.

UIAFC, which allocates community funds to a variety of Jewish agencies and organizations, has found that many of its recipient groups "are under-resourced, especially on campus," she said. "It's difficult to do the job there if they are under-invested."

Battle for Jewish souls hits streets of Toronto

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Theological war games unfolded on the streets of Toronto and York Region last week, in the first few days of an aggressive campaign by Jews for Jesus to convert Jews to Christianity.

The counter-drive launched by Jews for Judaism to the missionaries' "Behold Your God" campaign has taken on a militaristic flavour: two shifts of three or four volunteers each are dispatched daily in what the group calls "sorties" to confront the missionaries on busy street corners in a war of religious tracts.

Jews for Jesus launches aggressive campaign

The atmosphere at Jews for Judaism's Thornhill office is like a bunker: phone calls steadily stream in to reveal the other side's position, followed by rapid deployment of T-shirt clad volunteers fresh from training. Brochures are stacked high. Drinks are kept cold in a cooler bag. Cell phones ring constantly, and tips, predictions and even hunches are acted upon.

"We have to find them. We have a 50-50 chance of catching them," said Jews for Judaism director Julius Ciss, who spends hours each day in his car or donated minivan scouring the city for Jews for Jesus volunteers, identified by their own brightly-coloured T-shirts and brochures.

In 2001, Jews for Jesus launched a five-year, $22 million (US) drive to spread the Christian gospels in 66 cities outside Israel with Jewish populations of 25,000 and more. The campaign in Toronto will last until Sept. 14.

The Jews for Judaism volunteers stand only a few feet away from the missionaries, handing out their own leaflets and engaging the occasional passersby in conversation.

"People who encounter them have been quite upset," said Rabbi Skobac. "Many non-Jews are confused. Are they Jews or Christians? How can they be both?"

For the young generation

From the editor's desk

Orientation week on many university and college campuses across North America began this week. Finding their way through the unfamiliar terrain of this next, important phase in their lives will be the chief preoccupation for our "freshmen" children over the next few weeks. Adjusting and acclimatizing after a while to that terrain will bring them countless possibilities for the shape and depth of the lives they will eventually sculpt for themselves.

But, as we know, that terrain is not always friendly or accommodating. On any number of levels – intellectual, emotional, psychological and social – the new territory of university can be more forest than meadow.

In the past three years especially, some campuses – albeit a minority – have even been places of harsh, hostile winds against Jewish identity, Israel and anyone expressing support for the beleaguered Jewish state.

To hold fast and true to one's ideals and beliefs in the face of such hostility is no simple matter. It requires roots firmly planted: self-assurance, composure, resolve, information, awareness and courage. At any age, that poses a daunting test of character. But in the tender years after high school, in new and untested fields of ideological battle, it can be a burning crucible.

Whoever withstands that crucible, roots unscorched, is deserving of high praise.

Very often these "tall trees" of Jewish identity, their own roots secure, become, in subsequent years themselves, the supports and the strengths for the next generation. And then they are deserving of even more praise.

Two months ago, the children of renowned philanthropist Charles Bronfman – Stephen Bronfman, Ellen Bronfman Hauptman and Andrew Hauptman – decided to celebrate their father's 70th birthday by permanently endowing a prize, the Charles Bronfman Prize, that does precisely that. It will annually confer special praise on someone whose gmilut chesed, good work on behalf of others, has gone unnoticed.

But there is a profoundly new and unique element to this prize. It is aimed only at the younger generation. No one over 50 years old is eligible.

The prize is "an annual award to be given to one individual or team of individuals under the age of 50 whose humanitarian efforts on behalf of others have contributed significantly to the betterment of the Jewish world."

The award, which is worth $100,000 (US), comes with no strings attached. It may be used according to the whims or needs of the recipient.

Dalia Pollack, executive director of the Charles Bronfman Prize, which is administered in New York, told The CJN that the prize was established to "offer someone as an example of leadership to the emerging generation." Pollack emphasized that the prize is for the emerging generation. "Young people are the focus," she said to me more than once during our telephone conversation. "We are seeking exemplary young leaders."

A panel of five judges from Canada, Israel and the United States, individuals of "great renown," as Pollack explained, will sift through the list of nominations and choose a winner. But in keeping with the essential value the prize intends to seek and foster – action on behalf of the other – self-nomination is not permitted. To be eligible, a candidate or a team of candidates must be nominated by another party.

More information about the award can be obtained at www.thecharlesbronfmanprize.com. The office's phone number in New York is 212-572-1035. The deadline for submitting a nomination is Oct. 20.

In further fulfilment of The CJN's priority of publicizing the works of Israeli authors, I draw readers' attention to the most recently published novel by the veteran writer, literary critic, translator and journalist Yael Lotan.

Avishag (The Toby Press, 2002) is a fascinating, fictionalized excursion into the world of biblical history. It is ostensibly the story of Avishag, the young Shunamite woman who was recruited to help King David, by then an old man, keep warm during the cold winter nights of Jerusalem. In truth, it is not about the young girl, but rather about the king, his children and his kingdom.

Yael Lotan
AVISHAG

Lotan deftly recreates the sense of ancient Israel and Judea's geography, time and place. Her descriptions of the land and depictions of the style and manner of life of the tribes of Israel 3,000 years ago are captivating flights of imagination. With frequent allusions to the literature and language of the Bible, Avishag is a poignant tale of the king's very human qualities – frailty, vulnerability, courage and boldness – and of the court he commanded. Lotan adds to the atmosphere of the story by frequently incorporating the text of familiar verses, or variations of them, into the narrative.

Avishag is a quick, entertaining read and will be savoured by anyone who enjoys fictionalized biblical history. But it is not for individuals who might find offence in the author's unvarnished, all-too-human portrayal of figures whom we and our tradition have always revered.

BJCC project puts seniors' life stories on video

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Janet Klein Slavin says everyone has a story to tell.

As the supervisor of 55+, the department of adult services at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC), she said she finds it fascinating to pick up "snippets of people's lives."

In an attempt to make these stories permanent, Klein Slavin, who for 4½ years headed the Canadian branch of the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation created by Steven Spielberg, has begun interviewing seniors on videotape.

"One way or another, everyone has a story to leave their children or grandchildren. Putting it down on tape can be very fulfilling."

The two people she had interviewed so far, she said, "walked away feeling good about themselves. They felt as if they had done something toward continuity."

Joe Starr, 86, a retired pharmacist, said he was hesitant at first about putting his story on tape, but after Klein Slavin began interviewing him, he recalled incidents he hadn't thought about in years.

"I got a lot of satisfaction from bringing back these aspects of my life, and when I showed the tape to my children and grandchildren, they were thrilled.

"I recommend it for anyone who wants to perpetuate their life," Starr said.

Anita Budman, who was also interviewed, said she obviously could not document her whole life on the two-hour tape, but she did talk about things that had been in the back of her mind.

"I was born in London, England, and as a child during the war, I was shipped out of London and billeted with a family.

"That is a great story to put on tape and share with my children, and especially my grandchildren, who are too young now to appreciate it."

Klein Slavin, who interviewed thousands of people for the Shoah Foundation, said the videotape is for personal use only. "They walk out of the interview with their tape in hand. There is no other copy."

She is there, she said, to guide them through a sequence of questions beginning with their name at birth and where they family comes from. "I try to ask open-ended questions, so one thing leads to another.

"Some people think their children may not be interested in these stories, but trust me, in years to come the great-grandchildren will appreciate seeing their great-grandmother on television talking about her life. Most people are interested in their roots.

"It also opens up emotions that people might have suppressed. To me, I can't see how that could be a bad thing," said Klein Slavin.

The project, called the BJCC Keepsake Video, is open to members and non-members, and costs $50, which all goes back to the department of adult services.

She is seeking people willing to volunteer about four hours in an afternoon to act as videographers for the project. "All they have to do is make sure the person is in focus. They do not need to be professionals."

For information, call Klein Slavin at 416-636-1880, ext. 259, or e-mail at bjcc55plus@bjcc.ca

Tu b'Av: The Jewish day of love

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

Poetry in the air, love on the menu, flickering candles. No, it's not Feb. 14. It's Tu b'Av, the 15th day of the month of Av.

While this Jewish "Valentine's Day" dates back to the pre-talmudic era, Rabbi Aubrey Glazer blended tradition with modernity at a Tu b'Av Love Poetry Slam sponsored by Generation Chutzpah, a group of 20- and 30-somethings he leads at Beth Tzedec Synagogue. Held on Aug.13 on the steamy outdoor patio of a downtown café, the summer evening was the perfect setting for cool drinks, the sizzling poetry of love and even a few words of Torah.

In the picture, Rabbi Glazer is second from the right (in the cap).

Many participants brought their own selections – written by themselves or others, ranging from English classics to Pablo Neruda to controversial modern Israeli poems. Those who came unprepared read excerpts from Rabbi Glazer's personal collection, including the Sufi poet Rumi, Hebrew feminist poetry and love verses by Yehuda Amichai.

Between poems, Rabbi Glazer served up a helping of Jewish history. He said the observance of Tu b'Av as a day of celebration dates back to our desert wanderings. Each year in the wilderness, the Jews would sleep in graves on the night of Tisha b'Av, the ninth of Av. In the morning, 15,000 people would not awaken, due to God's decree that the generation of the 12 spies would die in the desert.

In the 40th year, the Jews lay down as usual, but in the morning, all were alive. Not wanting to celebrate prematurely, they slept there an additional week, until the full moon of the 15th, when they realized the decree had been lifted. Then, the Talmud says, "They stood up and made it a day of celebration."

Rabbi Glazer – Aubrey, to fellow Chutzpahniks – did not overwhelm participants with information. He even brought along his own version of a gong, a pair of Tibetan bells to be rung if anyone, even himself, held forth excessively.

While a few modern mystics have attempted to re-create the experience of sleeping in graves, Rabbi Glazer said the message of celebration is most important. Though it's often confused with Tu b'Shvat (the 15th of Shevat), the Jewish "Arbour Day," or Tisha b'Av, Rabbi Glazer said, "This [Tu b'Av] is an underrated moment in Jewish time… celebrating the power of life after the catastrophe of the ninth of Av."

In ancient Israel, the Talmud relates, "the daughters of Jerusalem [would go] forth in song and dance in the vineyards," proclaiming, according to Rabbi Glazer's translation, "Yo, mista! Check things out over here and see what to choose from." It was, as Rabbi Shmuli Boteach, the author of Kosher Sex, says: "sort of an ancient Lollapalooza."

In an interview following the event, Rabbi Glazer said the goal of Generation Chutzpah is to approach Judaism with "humour, levity, laughter and joy… either through lesser-known holidays, or by giving a different spin to holidays we already know."

The group has created new traditions, such as last Purim's "Poly'Esther," featuring "NYC glam with classic house" and a $3 discount for anyone dressed "with a '70s flare." This year's programs will include a Latino-Israeli Sukkah experience and a Chanukah bash called Get Lit!

But Generation Chutzpah isn't just about partying. It also sponsors study sessions such as Sulha/Slichot (both words mean forgiveness), an ongoing Jewish/Muslim peace project and reading circle. The group also meets each Rosh Chodesh for a study group called What's Your Sign? and for a Phat Friday Shabbat service, a musical Shabbat service for 20-somethings.

Even the fun has a serious purpose. With a background in painting, poetry, theatre and filmmaking, Rabbi Glazer sees creativity as a legitimate entry point into Jewish life.

"I am very inspired by teachers in our tradition who are able to harness those creative sparks," he said.

Through him, Beth Tzedec is filling the "gaping hole between when you finish USY [United Synagogue Youth] and when you get married and have kids."

Young adults are questioning, Rabbi Glazer said, and sometimes the best answers are the least direct.

"I call it 'backdoor Judaism,'" he said. "It's like a house with many rooms… my hope is to open up a door for people to get into the larger house of Judaism."

Tel Aviv student joins Rubik's Cube tournament

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

Dror Vomberg was not even a twinkle in his mother's eye during the Rubik's Cube craze of the early '80s.

Nonetheless, the 20-year-old can solve the puzzle in under three minutes. Blindfolded.

Vomberg, who studies math at Tel Aviv University, was one of hundreds of "cubists" who attended the World Rubik's Games Championships at the Ontario Science Centre Aug. 23 and 24. It was the first competition of its kind to be held in more than two decades.

Invented by Hungarian Erno Rubik in the 1970s, the Rubik's Cube became one of the most successful toys of all time – more than 250 million cubes were sold. With 43 quintillion possible configurations and only one correct one, some people have been known to solve the puzzle in as little as 16 seconds.

"It's addictive," said Vomberg, absentmindedly turning the edges of his cube. "It's linear thinking. You have to visualize."

Amid the din of clicking plastic, contestants stood behind gigantic replicas of the multicoloured cubic puzzles. A digital clock ticking away above their heads, they deftly flipped and twisted the sides of their cubes, their hands moving at lightning speed.

Vomberg, who flew from Israel to attend the competition, returned to his seat disappointed. He did not break his record of solving a 3 x 3 cube in two minutes and 19 seconds, although three minutes and 56 seconds is still a pretty good time, he admitted.

Cubing is not very popular in Israel, he said, "especially blindfolded." Here, Vomberg said, everyone wants to talk to him, and several young, eager cubists asked him to autograph their cubes. While in Toronto, he has been interviewed on Canada A.M. and YTV.

Vomberg has been an avid cubist since he was a child, but it wasn't until he was 15 that he learned how to solve the cube blindfolded.

He once saw a man doing the puzzle behind his back and was inspired to try it himself.

"I thought this guy has to have extraordinary vision or something," he said. "I thought I'd try it."

It took Vomberg two weeks to master blindfolded cubing. The first time he solved the puzzle, it took him an hour. He has since shaved his time down to a a few minutes.

"It's the same system. I just need to memorize the places," said Vomberg, describing in great detail his technique.

He observes the cube briefly before putting the blindfold on. Once he memorizes where at least two squares are, he can figure out where the rest are supposed to go with a series of mathematical equations. Once one side of the cube is complete, the trick is to finish the rest without undoing it.

Cubing has given him a great opportunity to travel. In March, he competed on a German television show and after seeing an ad on a speedcubing Web site, decided to come to the competition in Toronto.

The blindfolded competition was not held on the stage with the other categories. Vomberg and other blindfolded cubists solved their puzzle in a silent room backstage.

Vomberg participated in the 3 x 3, 4 x 4 and 5 x 5 blindfolded cubing events. By the end, he says, his hands were very sore.

Vomberg, an observant Jew said he "freaked out a little" when he found out the first day of the competition fell on Shabbat.

He said the organizers were very flexible and allowed him to participate only on the second day. While he could not bring his trusty cube with him, on Saturday, Vomberg and his father walked 25 minutes from their hotel to the competition to watch from the sidelines.

A total of $18,000 (Cdn) in prize money was given out to the winners, but more precious were the bragging rights some cubists earned by breaking world records.

"I'm not interested in the money," said Vomberg. "Getting in the Guinness Book of World Records, it speaks for itself."

Rogues who bear close watching

There were two very ominous news items last week, each dealing with nuclear weapons in the potentially deadly hands of rogue rulers, part of the ghastly arsenal of rogue states. At the Six Nations meeting in China, North Korea announced it possessed nuclear weapons as well as the means to deliver them, and threatened it might soon conduct a test of its weaponry.

Halfway across the globe, in Vienna, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) confirmed that evidence of uranium enrichment activity had been found in Iran. Enriched uranium, of course, is vital for the production of nuclear weapons.

Where the world might be headed, with two such ideologically extreme, yet essentially lawless countries in possession of nuclear weapons, is frightful beyond all imagining. But it is precisely because of this awful fright that the civilized world must be spurred to contain the danger these developments pose to us all.

As these words were being written, the United States, China, Russia, South Korea and Japan were locked in discussions with North Korea about, inter alia, the abandonment of its nuclear arsenal. North Korean ruler Kim Yong Il is mercurial and unpredictable, yet we surmise his decisions are based on pragmatic underpinnings. Thus we retain the hope he will be swayed by self-interest rather than by self-delusion.

Iran, meanwhile, is reported to be rushing to enhance its supply of enriched uranium. This is indeed worrisome, for the theocrats who govern Iran are motivated by rigid religiously based doctrine that accommodates no worldview other than their own. And they have frequently expressed the view that their world has no room for a sovereign Jewish state in the Middle East.

Is there any doubt about where Iran would use its nuclear weapons? Is there any doubt that Israel is now, or would be later, the first in Iran's gunsights?

Reports indicate Iran has two uranium enrichment facilities that are both operating at advanced stages of production. There are also persistent reports that Russia has been instrumental in assisting the Iranians with the enrichment process.

The IAEA will meet Sept.8 to discuss Iran's problematic nuclear program. The agency knows the truth: under the guise of its civil nuclear program, Iran has been feverishly assembling the parts of a nuclear arsenal. Diplomats around the table in the Security Council also know the truth.

But who will speak the truth? Is it merely wishful thinking that the government of Canada, embroiled in its own diplomatic dispute with the ruling Iranian mullahs, will be among the first to do so?

The Iranian government and its nuclear ambitions need to be watched carefully. But it should not fall upon Israel alone to be the watchman. All peace-loving peoples should be on guard against Iran's theocrats, who threaten the peace and security of the entire world.

Compensation for Iraqi Jews

After the fall of Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, memories return of the grisly days, more than 50 years ago, when the Jews of Iraq lived under all kinds of pressure: persecution, blackmail, unemployment and martial law.

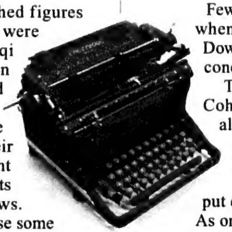
When we look back to those days, we find that there was a systematic, government-sponsored policy to persecute the Jews, freeze their assets, expropriate their properties, turn them to refugees and achieve a kind of ethnic cleansing.

Under international law, Jews who were forced to leave their country due to persecution or the threat of persecution are considered refugees and entitled to compensation. According to the International Court of Justice, compensation should be based on the value of the assets taken.

Certain sources in London, England, recently calculated that Iraq owes its former Jewish population some $20 billion (US).

The government of Iraq never published figures for the value of the Jewish assets that were frozen and confiscated. But some Iraqi sources estimated the value at $50 million (US) while Israel figures from 1951 placed the value at $436 million (US).

Over the years, many debates have taken place in the Jewish world about their entitlement to the assets. The government of Israel believes it is entitled to these assets because it absorbed the bulk of Iraqi Jews. Many oppose Israel's point of view because some of the assets belong to Jews who chose not to live in Israel and are not Israeli citizens.



Some people are now trying to link the issue of compensation for the loss of Iraqi Jewish assets with the issue of Palestinian compensation. Others insist there should be no linkage between the two issues. The question of compensation, whether claims are made individually or collectively, for the loss of Iraqi Jewish assets is strictly an issue for the government of Iraq to deal with.

I have no doubt that in the near future we will see individual claims being brought against the Iraqi authorities for Jewish assets that were left behind or stolen some 50 years ago.

Outraged at CRTC

In response to your recent article about the possibilty of the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) bringing Al Jazeera into Canada, I felt compelled to voice my complaint ("CJC submits brief CRTC on Al-Jazeera cable TV application," CJN, Aug. 21).

How can we possibly allow such an obviously distorted and corrupt network that airs propaganda to be broadcast on our air waves? Not only would this violate Canada's Broadcasting Act, the Broadcasting Distribution Regulations and the Criminal Code, but it would give Arabic extremists greater freedom in promoting their highly anti-Semitic and anti-western agendas!

How can the CRTC waste even a moment in considering Al-Jazeera's outrageous mandate? Certainly "freedom of speech" does not include an open licence for "hate propaganda." I am ashamed and appalled that the CRTC would actually consider their application.

The CRTC's e-mail address is procedure@crtc.gc.ca.

Tfillin and the Stones

Few Torontonians will forget July 30, 2003, when a crowd of 450,000 people packed Downsview Park for the country's largest rock concert.

Three Chabadniks – Chai Cohen, Yirmi Cohen and Shimon Dadon – were there too, along with their tfillin, asking Jewish concertgoers if they wanted to wear the phylacteries during prayers.

A steady stream of Jewish boys and men put on tfillin that day.

As one of the Chabadniks said, when will be the next time they will get a chance to put on tfillin at a Rolling Stones concert?

Jews have heavy responsibilities

Upon whose recommendations was a chair established at Tel Aviv University named after former Canadian prime minister Brian Mulroney? ("Tel Aviv U establishes Mulroney chair," CJN, Aug. 21).

Such choices for "sainthood" within our Jewish community can lead to disastrous results among the community's leadership.

Jews must not be indifferent about the political process that governs their lives, their community and their safety and security. We have heavy responsibilities where governments are concerned. We must demand from our own community representatives accountability for decisions made in our name. This is something we must work harder to remember.

French town hopes an anniversary will spur interest in a famous son

By PHILIP CARMEL

In 2005, Troyes, the ancient capital of the counts of Champagne in northern France, will celebrate the 900th anniversary of the death of its most famous son, medieval biblical commentator Rabbi Solomon ben Isaac, known to the Jewish world by his acronym of Rashi.

The author of the monumental commentary on the Talmud and the Torah, Rashi was born in Troyes in 1040, and although his grave has never been found, scholars believe he died there in about 1105.

For obvious reasons, the town missed out on the anniversary of Rashi's birth in 1940. The Champagne region around Troyes had as its prefect Rene Bousquet, who later headed the Vichy police and was responsible for numerous roundups of Jews during the Nazi occupation of France.

Today a small, well-kept medieval city about 100 miles east of Paris, Troyes was once at the centre of European trade routes located on the ancient Roman road connecting Milan in northern Italy with Boulogne-sur-mer on the English Channel.

Coupled with its proximity to Flanders and the cities of the Rhineland, this made the town one of the major trading hubs in Europe, an advantage seized upon by the Counts of Champagne, who instituted the twice-yearly Champagne fairs, where traders from across the continent would ply their wares.

With these traders came Jews, welcomed by the Counts of Champagne and protected in the Jewish quarter close to the city's cathedral.

Rashi's family probably came to Troyes from across the Rhine in Germany, and he himself spent some 10 years studying in the Rhineland at Worms in the famous Yeshiva of Mainz, founded by Rabbeinu Gershom, the "Light of the Diaspora."

Today, virtually nothing remains of the city's history from the time of Rashi. A large part of the city was destroyed by fire in 1524.

Nevertheless, the 16th-century wooden building that houses the synagogue in the heart of the old section of Troyes is still there. It now serves as the Jewish community centre and holds regular Shabbat and holiday services.

Across the narrow street from the synagogue is the Rashi Institute, which provides courses in Jewish studies and regularly hosts conferences.

In close co-operation with the Troyes municipality, the institute has already begun preparing for the 900th anniversary of Rashi's death in 2005, and intends to bring together the world's 20 leading experts on Rashi's works for a conference in the city.

It has also set as one of its primary goals to increase awareness among the local population in Troyes and the Champagne region of the contribution of Rashi and other talmudic masters from the area.

Although there are a number of sites associated with Rashi in Troyes, including a statue of him unveiled by Elie Wiesel to mark the 850th anniversary of his birth in 1990, the local population has shown little interest.

"Unfortunately, Rashi is really only associated with Troyes for the Jewish community," said the city's deputy director for tourism, Laurence Hugin-Pujol.

"I've been working here for 25 years and in that time, we've never really exploited Rashi to the full. Sometimes, we get groups from England and Israel who ask us about Rashi and we direct them to the synagogue. But the synagogue is usually closed and you can only go there by prior invitation."

Recognizing the need, the city recently inaugurated a themed walk titled In the Footsteps of Rashi. There is also a memorial to Rashi.

Although Troyes hasn't highlighted Rashi's importance, the city hasn't neglected Israel or its Jewish past.

According to the town's rabbi, Abba Samoun, Troyes is the only city in Europe with a Ben-Gurion Square accompanied by a statue of Israel's first prime minister.

In addition, the city hall is located on a public thoroughfare named after a former Jewish mayor and senator in the national legislature, Alexandre Israel.

There is also a memorial to the region's Jews who were deported to Nazi concentration camps.

For Samoun, the placement of the Holocaust memorial was particularly significant: it sits next to the memorial for the wartime French Resistance and its light is pointed toward Jerusalem.

Naturally, there is a Rashi Street, and Samoun succeeded in persuading the city council to take down the sign that described the street as a dead end.

Some of the problems facing French Jews are absent from Troyes, said Suzanna Gutmacher, former president of the city's B'nai Brith Rashi Lodge.

"There are no problems with anti-Semitism here, and we have excellent relations with the Muslim community," she said.

Despite Rashi's reputation as being the greatest and most widely studied Torah commentator, his heritage factors minimally in the life of Troyes' Jewish community.

Rashi Institute administrator Florence Saherer said she had been born and raised in Troyes, "but we never learned about Rashi in school."

Saherer said she received puzzled looks from fellow Troyens when she told them she was working at the Rashi Institute.

"They all knew the synagogue, but most people didn't know who Rashi was," she said.

Like most of the Troyes community in his area, Rashi managed to escape the ravages of the First Crusade – and he soon became well-known even outside his native Champagne region.

By the 13th century, his commentaries on the Bible were being quoted by Christian theologians in Paris.

Because Rashi wanted his work to be understood by the Jews he knew and lived with in Troyes, the style and language of his writings earned him the sobriquet "Hatzarfati," or "the Frenchman."

Wherever there was a need to explain a difficult word in the text of the Hebrew or Aramaic in his Torah or Talmud commentaries, Rashi used his own language. There are almost 3,000 words of 11th-century Champenois French inserted into his writing, a valuable source for researchers of the development of the French language.

Despite the fact that Rashi both taught and wrote in Troyes, Samoun said he was almost certainly not the city's rabbi.

Rather, Rashi, like other medieval scholars, was strict in upholding the talmudic injunction against earning one's living from teaching the Torah.

In fact, he owned vineyards and was a winemaker – very much in keeping with the Champagne region in which he lived.

Troyes rabbi worries about the future

One of the most notable features of Abba Samoun's office in Troyes, France, is the grey military uniform and short-peaked cap commonly worn by French police and military officers.

An army chaplain, Samoun had just returned from a trip to a prison near Toulouse in southern France, around 500 miles from his home, just around the corner from the 16th-century medieval building that houses the synagogue in Troyes.

Apart from his role as an army chaplain, Samoun visits Jewish prisoners across the country, often interceding with the authorities to make sure they are provided with kosher meals.

Samoun, who is in his 70s, said the constant train and air travel tires him and also takes him away from his other work as chief rabbi of Troyes and Champagne-Ardennes.

Born in Fez, Morocco, Samoun immigrated to France in 1946 and began studying in one of the country's leading yeshivahs in the eastern spa town of Aix-les-Bains.

In 1951, Isidore Frankforter, a leading figure in the Troyes Jewish community, brought Samoun to the city to assist in the Jewish education of his two daughters.

Initially employed in Frankforter's hat factory, Samoun was soon to be engaged as a teacher in Troyes' Jewish education classes, and by 1952, he was officially installed as the "officiating minister" of the Troyes community.

"I was young and I wanted to do something in this city of Rashi. I asked where the shul was but there wasn't one," he said.

Many Jews from the Champagne region were deported during World War II, and those who had returned to Troyes held prayers in a house, Samoun said.

"The Protestant community in Troyes gave us a room to pray in, but we had a problem for Shavuot because it clashed with their Pentecost," he said.

For some time, Samoun said, the community only held services on Passover and the High Holy Days.

"I decided we'd try for Shabbat services as well. We weren't sure of a minyan, but you're not going to get any customers if you don't open the shop," he said.

Eventually, the community received a permanent home in a 16th-century building, which had been occupied by a local parish priest.

Until the early 1960s, the Troyes synagogue had always held services according to Ashkenazi customs, although with many families arriving from North Africa, this soon changed.

"The community leaders who were Ashkenazi recognized that they were no longer the majority and they willingly initiated the change," Samoun said.

Nevertheless, Samoun pointed out, "I have retained some parts of the Ashkenazi tradition in the services, so that you can say we have a certain Troyes service."

"I have always believed that Jews should live and worship together," Samoun said. "To their credit, the community leaders have always felt like this as well that there should be no question of two synagogues in Troyes."

With around 120 families, the community holds regular services on Shabbat and holidays, "but people will always try and put together a minyan when somebody has yahrzeit," Samoun said.

The product of an Ashkenazi yeshiva education, Samoun has no trouble throwing out European Jewish terms despite his own Sephardi roots.

He said the future of the Troyes community does not look bright.

Generally, the young members of the community leave to study in Paris because Troyes has no university.

"They settle in Paris or they go to Israel and their parents join them," he said with a mixture of pride and sadness.

One idea to keep the community alive was to create the Rashi Institute, he said.

"I thought we could have a yeshiva here and Jewish students would come and invigorate the community," Samoun said.

However, while the Rashi Institute runs courses and conferences and is affiliated with Israel's Bar-Ilan University, most of the people who take courses there are non-Jews.

"This is happening with many smaller communities in France. Here in the Champagne region, there are towns where the rabbi left and now they only hold services on Yom Kippur," Samoun said.

But this must not be allowed to happen in Troyes, he said.

"It's like the story in the Talmud about the carob tree. It only gives fruit in 70 years. You plant it for your children. It took a long time to finish renovating the synagogue and now we have a mikvah as well. Jewish schools come here and sometimes they stay for Shabbat. There always has to be a Jewish community in the town of Rashi," Samoun said.

The synagogue that Washington once visisted

Newport, Rhode Island, is a charming little town that attracts hordes of visitors each summer. Some are drawn to Newport's yachting facilities or to the International Tennis Hall of Fame, while others come to view the many stately homes that dot its shoreline. These mansions, reminders of the so-called "gilded age," provide tourists with a first-hand glimpse of how families like the Vanderbilts and the Astors and others of their kind used to live.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

But as with so many other enclaves in New England, there is another dimension to Newport – a historic dimension that has a significant Jewish context. Atop a hill in the midtown section of Newport, you will find the Touro Synagogue – recognized as the oldest shul in the United States.

Though the synagogue itself was built in 1759, there has been a Jewish presence in Newport since 1658, when 15 Spanish and Portuguese Jewish families arrived there, likely from Curaçao. These newcomers, some of whom were Marranos, were looking for a place where they could practise their religion without fear of persecution. They found such a haven in the colony of Rhode Island, whose governor, Roger Williams, was a firm proponent of religious freedom.

Their expectations were not unfounded, and the tiny community grew and prospered in an atmosphere of tolerance and free will.

George Washington, the first U.S. president, visited Newport in 1781. While he was there, a town meeting was held at the synagogue. As if to endorse the prevailing benevolence towards the Jewish minority of Newport, in 1790 Washington sent a letter addressed "To the Hebrew Congregation in Newport, R.I." The letter has since been regarded as the classic expression of religious moderation in America.

In his note, Washington wrote, "For happily the Government of the United States, which gives to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance, requires only that they who live under its protection should demean themselves as good citizens in giving it on all occasions their effectual support."

I was only in Newport for a few hours. Inasmuch as the Tennis Hall of Fame was enticing, in a very different and much more meaningful way, so was that enchanting little synagogue. Made of brick imported from England, with ornate candelabras and an ancient Torah inscribed on parchment, the synagogue stands as a shining testament to the resilience of its founders.

It also aptly reflects on a particular era of enlightenment that not only provided refuge to Jews from faraway lands, but also gave them the opportunity to embrace, without intimidation, the very tenets of their religion and cultural heritage.

Landing on their feet

At the end of their first day far from home, Illil Aroch, Nofar Katzav, Shai Gal and Eitan Magen could be forgiven for thinking they were hallucinating. There was, after all, something unreal about their mid-summer adventure.

Hours earlier, they had been in the tense, hard-boiled reality of Israel. Now they were a world away in a wilderness paradise. One moment, they were with their families in the Tel Aviv blue-collar suburb of Or Yehuda; the next, they were at Camp Tamakwa in Ontario's enchanted Algonquin Park, with 450 people they had never seen before.

For Illil, Nofar, Shai and Eitan, the first 24 hours of camp were mesmerizing, unlike anything they'd ever experienced. Jet-lagged, culture-shocked, emotionally drained, linguistically challenged, senses overloaded, they went to sleep overwhelmed by the sudden change.

That change had been made possible by Tamakwa's two owners, Vic Norris and David Bale, and alumni, who wanted to show their solidarity with Israel by offering a month-long stay at the camp to kids who otherwise could not even dream of such an experience. The first beneficiaries were two boys and two girls between the ages of 12 and 14.

As Tamakwa's only staff members from Israel, my wife Galya and I were delighted to help with the project, part of a larger operation bringing Israeli youth to North American camps. In late July, we drove to Toronto with Tamakwa co-owner David Bale to greet the Israelis at Pearson Airport and to bring them to camp. For all except one, it was their first trip in an airplane and first time leaving Israel.

After the three-hour drive north from the airport, they boarded a boat for the five-minute ride to Tamakwa, which is accessible only by water. Little could they anticipate what awaited them. As the boat approached the camp's main dock, several hundred campers and staff broke into a rousing cheer to welcome the newcomers. Some held banners in Hebrew and a huge Israeli flag.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

The Israeli kids were stunned when they realized this was just for them. As they disembarked, they were quickly engulfed by the welcoming crowd. It was a highly emotional scene.

In recent years, the number of Israelis brought to camps in Canada and the United States as staff or campers has grown tremendously. The impact is enormous, both for Israelis and their Diaspora hosts.

At Tamakwa, the Israelis integrated well into the community despite their lack of camp experience. "This was far better than I ever expected," says Eitan, 14. "It's been so much fun. There were so many activities here that I loved doing and everybody treated me so well."

Although they missed their families and friends, the Israelis appreciated the break from the tension back home.

"I feel better that for one month, I could try to forget the situation back in Israel and think about something else," says Illil, 12. "Still, I can't really get Israel out of my mind. After all, it's my country."

"Being in such a peaceful place makes me feel better," says Shai, 14. "It let me free mind from the tensions of Israel."

Camp also served as a rewarding challenge.

"At first, it was difficult to be here," says Nofar, 13. "But with the warmth and support of everyone, I learned to deal with a new situation and to enjoy camp so much."

Meanwhile, Tamakwa's other campers appreciated the chance to get to know real, live Israelis.

"They taught us to appreciate things even more," says Alex Budman, 12. "When we heard from Nofar and Illil about their life in Israel and how scary and difficult it can be, we realized how lucky we are to live in such a peaceful place. It also made me so happy to see them have fun and relax in Algonquin Park."

Based on the success of this summer's pilot project, Tamakwa's owners hope to continue it next year.

"We see this as a win-win situation," says Bale. "For the Israelis, it's a unique experience and a welcome respite from danger. As for our North American campers, they typically see Israel's tensions from afar. But to connect personally and emotionally with kids who live daily with those tensions is a valuable experience."

Illil, Nofar, Shai and Eitan know the impact that their month at Tamakwa has had on them. I hope one day they'll realize the impact that they have had on Tamakwa.

Long may this project continue.

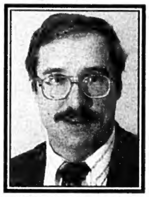
Terror under the banner of peace studies

Peace studies, like human rights, humanitarian relief and international law, are noble causes that have been abused and perverted to support hatred, terror and war. On many university campuses, peace studies and conflict resolution programs have become part of the campaign to demonize Israel and support Palestinian incitement and the rejectionist ideologies that provide the foundation of terrorism.



Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In a blatant example of Orwellian newspeak, in which war has been disguised as peace, the Sydney Peace Foundation at the University of Sydney in Australia has decided to award its annual peace prize to Hanan Ashrawi in November.

This action not only sanctions and rewards the terrorism and violence of the PLO and President Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority, in which Ashrawi has served as a cabinet minister, but is an endorsement of violence that she has advocated. Ashrawi is a central figure in the Palestinian propaganda machine and an eloquent defender of Palestinian atrocities. MIFTAH, a non-governmental organization in which she is centrally involved, is a major purveyor of hatred and venom (see www.ngo-monitor.org).

In the campaign to delegitimize the Jewish state (the modern version of anti-Semitism), Ashrawi indeed deserves a prize.

One of the most concentrated displays of disinformation and venom took place in September 2001, when Ashrawi addressed the UN Conference on Racism in Durban, South Africa. This notorious meeting was the pivot of the anti-Semitic campaign equating Zionism with racism, and the Palestinian spokeswoman repeated the catalogue of incitement using terms such as "exclusion, denial, racism… oppression, violence, cruelty, and injustice… persistent colonialism, apartheid, racism [again]," etc.

Indeed, this false prophet of peace travels the world promoting fictitious Palestinian history in which the violent Arab rejection of the 1947 United Nations partition – the mother of all UN resolutions on the Middle East – simply disappears. Instead, in Durban and on many other platforms, she violated the memory of the thousands of Israelis and Palestinians who were killed as a result of Arab hatred, violence and inability to accept compromise. Instead, she presents the standard tale of victimization in which "the Palestinians as a people were slated for national obliteration, cast outside the course of history, their identity denied and their very human cultural and historical reality suppressed."

In describing Jerusalem as the "heart of Palestine," Ashrawi followed Arafat's lead in denying 3,000 years of Jewish religious and historic ties to this city. There was no apology for the 1948-1967 occupation, in which sacred Jewish sites were systematically desecrated and Jews were barred from entry, in violation of the armistice agreements.

The 1967 war, which was the result of the continued effort to destroy Israel, is recast as an Israeli war of "systematic oppression and brutality." The Arab rejection of the "land for peace" formula at the Khartoum summit in 1967 and for many years afterwards, is also conveniently removed in this creative script, as are the decades of Palestinian terror. Ashrawi, an English teacher by training, deserves the award for fiction, but not for peace.

While it would be charitable to give the Sydney Peace Prize jury, including faculty members and leading politicians, the benefit of the doubt, and attribute the choice for this award to ignorance, the evidence points to a malicious intent. Last year, the same award was given to Mary Robinson, who, as the head of the UN Commission on Human Rights, was responsible for the UN's Durban fiasco and the systematic demonization of Israel.

By honouring Ashrawi for her "commitment to human rights, to the peace process in the Middle East and… courage in speaking against oppression, against corruption and for justice," the Sydney Peace Prize has become a mockery.

Unless the university rescinds this decision before the award in November, the students at Sydney University will find that their diplomas will be associated with the promotion of hate and justification of violence, and nothing else.

The Kirshner File

Collapse of the hudna may imperil road map

As ceasefires go, the hudna was not even a respite. As some skeptics noted on June 29, the day it took effect, the three-month truce was not really worth the paper it was written on.

Among those who questioned its durability was the Israeli chief of staff, Gen. Moshe Yaalon, and the top leadership of the Shin Bet, Israel's internal intelligence agency. Yaalon mused that the countdown to the next round of violence had already begun, while the Shin Bet warned of further terrorism.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

And now that the hudna has crumbled, having been formally renounced by Hamas and Islamic Jihad following Israel's targeted killing of Islamic Jihad's military leader in Hebron, it is clear beyond a shadow of doubt that the naysayers were right.

The truce, which was signed by the Palestinian Authority, Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, suited the Palestinians and Israel while it lasted. The PA prime minister, Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), had no appetite for confronting Palestinian radicals and was eager to get on with the business of implementing the road map for peace, which was officially unveiled on April 30 and launched with a frisson of fanfare at the Aqaba summit in early June.

Though he was not a party to the hudna, Israel's prime minister, Ariel Sharon, had a vested interest in dampening the Palestinian uprising, which has claimed the lives of more than 800 Israeli civilians and soldiers since Sept. 28, 2000, and moving forward on the road map, Israel's only hope of reaching an accommodation with the Palestinians.

The hudna was vitally important because it strengthened the hand of those who wanted to implement the first phase of the road map in a reasonably calm atmosphere. In accordance with the road map, Israel – which reoccupied the West Bank in the spring of 2002 after an unbroken chain of suicide bombings – withdrew from the centre of Bethlehem and the northern Gaza Strip.

But barely had the ink on the hudna dried than the first civilian – a Bulgarian foreign labourer working on Israel's security fence – was gunned down by a Palestinian gunman. A week later, on July 7, an Islamic Jihad bomber blew himself up in an Israeli village close to the Green Line, killing a 65-year-old woman.

In the next few weeks, more deadly incidents marred the hudna. On July 15, a 24-year old man was stabbed to death on Tel Aviv's beachfront promenade, and on July 28, the lifeless body of a kidnapped Israeli soldier was found. On Aug. 3, a car driven by an Israeli woman was ambushed near Bethlehem, and she and her three children sustained serious to moderate wounds. On Aug. 12, suicide bombers from Hamas and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade killed three Israelis in Ariel, a settlement in the West Bank, and in Rosh Haayin, a town in Israel.

While the hudna was still in force, Israel fended off almost 300 attacks in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, some of which were supposedly ordered and financed by Iran. But compared to the pre-hudna days, there was a perceptible drop in violence.

During this period, the Israeli army raided towns and villages in the West Bank, dismantling bomb factories, arresting scores of Palestinian activists and would-be bombers and slaying several militants.

There was, so to speak, a balance of terror, which both sides tolerated through gritted teeth. But on Aug. 19, following Israel's assassination of Mohmmed Sidr in Hebron, a Hamas bomber detonated himself on a crowded bus in Jerusalem, snuffing out the lives of 21 haredim, the first direct assault on their cloistered community. Hamas and Islamic Jihad had warned Israel they would respond to targeted killings. Israel's reaction was swift. Ismail Abu Shanab, a leading Hamas figure and spokesman based in Gaza, was incinerated by Israeli missiles.

By way of response, Hamas and Islamic Jihad, which had used the hudna to regroup and build up its stocks of Qassam missiles, abandoned the ceasefire. In addition, they threatened vengeance and fired Qassams into Gaza and southern Israel, several of which landed near and in Ashkelon.

As the hudna unravelled, Israel suspended all negotiations with the PA, imposed a general closure of the territories and stepped up the pace of raids into the West Bank. Yaalon, meanwhile, put the leaders of Hamas and Islamic Jihad on notice that they would be targeted for "liquidation." Abdel Aziz Rantisi, a Hamas militant wounded by an Israeli missile strike in June, ruled out the possibility of restoring the hudna without a complete Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza. But later, another Hamas leader expressed a desire to renew the hudna.

None too pleased by the recent turn of events, the PA temporarily severed contacts with Hamas and Islamic Jihad, announced "operational" measures against them and offered to fight terrorism, provided Israel halted its forays into the West Bank. In a counter thrust, Israel said it would not suspend its raids until the PA took decisive action against the infrastructure of terrorism, a key demand of the road map. Under heavy U.S. pressure, the PA closed three tunnels used to smuggle weapons and drugs from Egypt into Gaza and deployed police in Gaza to prevent the further firing of Qassam rockets into Israel.

Shaul Mofaz, Israel's defence minister, was hardly impressed. He chided the PA for its disinclination to dismantle the terrorist infrastructure, saying that peace talks would not be resumed until that was done, and claimed that the PA's actions were exercises in public relations.

Abdel Aziz Rantisi

By the terms of the road map, which aims at a two-state solution within two years, the PA is duty bound to arrest militants, confiscate their weapons, break up their organizations and ensure that the Palestinian autonomous areas are not used as a springboard for violence directed at Israelis. The PA is also expected to cease its campaign of incitement against Israel. For its part, Israel must freeze all settlement activity, take down outposts erected since March 2001, pull out of areas occupied since the outbreak of the intifadah and ease conditions for the Palestinians.

During the hudna, the PA issued decrees outlawing incitement, prompting Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom to remark that "we are seeing the beginning of a change." But Abbas, who has decried the militarization of the intifadah, refused to bring militants into line through force, saying it was "not an option." Fearing that a showdown would touch off a Palestinian civil war, Abbas said he preferred the powers of persuasion to convince the militants to lay down their arms.

Due, perhaps, to Abbas' reluctance to confront Hamas and Islamic Jihad, Israel did not fully comply with the road map either. Israel did not freeze settlement activity, turned a blind eye to the building of new outposts after existing ones had been ripped down and refrained from ending its siege of Palestinian towns such as Nablus and Qalqilya.

The Palestinians, too, accused Israel of undermining the roadmap by continuing to build a barrier through the West Bank and by refusing to release large numbers of prisoners. In fact, there are no references to the fence or prisoners in the road map. Israel also incurred the wrath of the Palestinians by removing only a few checkpoints and by declining to free PA President Yasser Arafat from house arrest in his battered headquarters.

The conflicting and seemingly irreconcilable demands raised by Israel and the PA have blocked any further progress in advancing the road map. Martin Indyk, the former U.S. ambassador to Israel, summarized the diplomatic impasse quite aptly: "Mr. Abbas and Mohammed Dahlan, the Palestinian security minister, cannot and will not act against terrorist groups until they gain greater popular support from Palestinians. To achieve this support, they need Israel to remove settlement outposts and checkpoints, release prisoners in significant numbers and withdraw (the army) from West Bank cities and towns. But Mr. Sharon cannot make serious moves in these areas until Mr. Abbas and Mr. Dahlan act against the terrorist infrastructure."

Two weeks ago, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell asked Arafat to allow Abbas to consolidate PA "security elements" under his command so that he can impose his will on Palestinian rejectionists. But Arafat, angered over his diminished powers, jealous of Abbas, resentful of U.S. and Israeli efforts to marginalize and render him irrelevant and eager to assert himself, has not cooperated. In a pointed snub, he not only rejected Powell's request, but appointed a new interior minister and a new security advisor. Last week, however, Arafat called for a new ceasefire.

Since being forced by Sharon and President George W. Bush to appoint Abbas as prime minister, Arafat has continually denigrated his handling of talks with Israel and tried to undermine his authority. In July, out of sheer frustration, Abbas threatened to resign from Arafat's Fatah movement.

Abbas, a weak leader, wants to succeed. But if he fails to overcome Arafat's challenges, the road map may well share the same dismal fate as the Oslo peace process.

Rabbi deals with life experiences in book on psalms

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Paul Plotkin began a sabbatical in the fall of 1998 with the idea of re-nurturing himself, but the book he wrote that year offers spiritual sustenance for others, providing down-to-earth links between ancient psalms and modern-day issues.

A Toronto native who served Congregation Beth Israel in Vancouver from 1976 to 1978 before settling in south Florida, the 53-year-old rabbi writes frankly in the book's introduction about his anguish over the end of his first marriage. That experience in 1994, and the dramatic difference one psalm made, became the catalyst for The Lord Is My Shepherd – Why Do I Still Want? (Sunbelt/Eakin Press).

The recently published book (available online through www.amazon.ca or www.mypsalms.net, and locally, thus far, at Israel's Judaica Centre) was not written for a Jewish audience per se. "I felt the message transcended the Jewish base and could speak to people of all faiths and no faiths," said Rabbi Plotkin in a telephone interview from Margate, Fla., where he has been spiritual leader of Temple Beth Am for 20 years.

> 'We are as guilty as everybody else of allowing our prayers to become rote'

On his sabbatical in Melbourne, Australia and Israel – accompanied by his wife Cheryl, a criminal attorney whom he married in 1996 – the rabbi spent each morning working on the book until he had gone through all 150 psalms. "I tried to find things I could relate to it."

Although the writing was completed in a year, Rabbi Plotkin, the father of three grown children, says the book really took his whole life. "It was a way of pulling everything I had learned, developed and evolved to, into one place."

One of the earliest experiences he writes about took place at the family cottage in Jackson's Point in 1966, when a younger acquaintance, also named Paul, was killed in a car accident. The rabbi's maternal grandmother, to whom the book is dedicated, had always reminded him to say Modeh Ani, the prayer to thank God for returning one's soul on awakening. That morning, having just learned of the accident, Rabbi Plotkin, then 16, was moved by the prayer in a profound way for the first time.

Such moments are rare, even for rabbis, he admits. "We are as guilty as everybody else of allowing our prayers to become rote."

On difficult days, he says, he allows himself a slower pace of davening. Reading a favourite line that speaks to him, calms or directs him is "like a booster shot."

Rabbi Paul Plotkin

In The Lord Is My Shepherd, Rabbi Plotkin deals with issues including abandonment, old age, illness, death, loneliness, slander, and even geekiness, drawing on some of his own experiences at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute, which he attended for two years. Teenagers swimming against the tide can relate to the psalmist who is "surrounded by the 'cool' people," he suggests.

An alumnus of Associated Hebrew Day Schools, Rabbi Plotkin studied sociology at York University and received a master's degree in Judaica from the Jewish Theological Seminary, where he was ordained in 1976.

As a youngster, he grew up in a traditional but not shomer Shabbat home, and spent much time at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, where he was United Synagogue Youth (USY) president and later youth director. Every Saturday, he studied Talmud with Rabbi Joseph Kelman, now rabbi emeritus, at the rabbi's home.

It was at Rabbi Kelman's suggestion that Rabbi Plotkin became observant around the time of his bar mitzvah, he recalls. His parents, Goldie and Isaac, supported his decision, with the understanding that he would also respect their lifestyle.

His paternal grandfather, Chaim Plotkin, whom he recalls as "maybe 5'1" and larger than life," was a Lubavitcher shochet and mohel. (The family is not related to Rabbi Avraham Plotkin of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham.)

Rabbi Plotkin realized as an undergraduate at York that everything he cared about was Jewish. He recalls "judaicizing" every paper he wrote, using Jewish themes and examples regardless of the subject. That was when the would-be lawyer changed course.

On Beth Am's Web site, Rabbi Plotkin said the aspect of his work that makes him feel best is leaving someone in pain or crisis "with a smile on their face or a direction when they had none." Writing the book and hearing from people who've read it and giving it to friends dealing with personal crises, he says, has also been rewarding.

Adath Israel Synagogue gets new youth director

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

One of the youth programs planned for this winter at Adath Israel Congregation is an outing to see the play Fiddler on the Roof at Leah Posluns Theatre.

That should come as no surprise to anyone who knows the synagogue's new youth director, 24-year-old Brianne Buckman – a choreographer, dance studio owner, former competitive dancer and former student intern on Broadway.

Although it's not her mandate per se to bring the arts to Jewish youth, "it's who I am, so it will naturally happen," Buckman said last week in an interview at Reach Dance Academy, the Thornhill school she opened last summer after graduating from York University's combined bachelor of arts/bachelor of education program.

In addition to drawing on her arts background, Buckman wants to bring "a lot of life and energy" to synagogue programs and "make 'em fun."

With United Synagogue Youth (USY, the Conservative movement's high school arm) slated to hold its international convention in Toronto in December, this will be a big year for Adath Israel's USY group, Buckman said. The group, like its counterparts at other synagogues, will host a USY group from elsewhere following the convention.

Brianne Buckman

As youth director, Buckman and her staff of five oversee programs for youngsters from senior kindergarten through high school.

No stranger to youth programs in the Conservative movement, Buckman worked for six years at Richmond Hill's Beit Rayim Synagogue as USY adviser, and also worked with younger children ages four and up.

As a student at York, Buckman arranged her own exchange program with New York University in 2001, enabling her to study musical theatre choreography and theatre in education in Manhattan for a semester. While there, she interned at Entertainment Tonight and at an educational theatre company called Camp Broadway, where she worked as a teaching artist for Broadway's The Music Man.

At Beit Rayim, where Buckman attended Hebrew school as a youngster, she drew on her arts skills to choreograph a fashion show and organize a talent show.

Last year, while working as a teacher at Baythorn Arts Elementary School, she turned the tables, bringing aspects of the Jewish experience to her multicultural Grade 7 English class with the use of dance, drama and poetry to teach a Holocaust unit. Her students' poems were on display in May at the Sheppard Grande as part of "ECHOES: Artistic Expressions of the Holocaust," an event co-ordinated by the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Toronto.

As a teacher, Buckman is following in the footsteps of her mother, Miriam, who teaches at Netivot Hatorah Day School.

Buckman and her older brother, Brent, were raised in a house filled with music. She remembers singing Hebrew and Yiddish songs with her Bubbie, and her father David – a lawyer who had his own band in Montreal before moving to Toronto – sang a duet with Brianne at Reach's end-of-year showcase.

An alumna of the first Canadian Birthright Israel trip, Buckman feels a much stronger connection to Israel than she did before, she said.

Her connection to Adath Israel is also stronger than her position there, of itself, might indicate. She and her fiancé, David Kalechstein, are planning their wedding there next summer.

Few confrontations between Jews for Jesus, Jews for Judaism

So far, there have been few confrontations between the two sides. While groups of four to six Jews for Jesus have threatened to call police to allege they are being harassed by Jews for Judaism, the law was involved only once last week, at the corners of Queen and Bay streets. Three patrolling officers were stopped by Jews to Jesus, who said they were being shadowed and bothered by Jews for Judaism. Unimpressed, the officers said the counter-missionaries were doing nothing illegal.

"We're being very careful. We're keeping our distance from them and staying on public property. We're not engaging in shouting matches or being confrontational in any way," Ciss said.

But that doesn't mean the counter-measures will make it easy for Jews for Jesus. The cat-and-mouse tactics will continue.

"We have 80 volunteers ready at a moment's notice and others on stand-by. We have sorties going out twice a day," Ciss said. "The problem is, they're out earlier in the morning and staying out later at night."

To date, the movements of Jews for Jesus members have been random but somewhat predictable. They've showed up at several busy downtown intersections with high pedestrian traffic, at Union Station, at the corners of Yonge Street and Eglinton Avenue, and along the Bathurst Street corridor.

But Jews for Judaism notes a first: The missionaries have ventured north of Steeles Avenue and were spotted last week briefly at Clark and Bathurst streets, and going door to door in Thornhill.

"The forays into Thornhill have never happened before," says Rabbi Michael Skobac, director of education for Jews for Judaism.

The CJN accompanied Ciss and three Jews for Judaism volunteers last week on an outing. But after three hours on a circuitous route through downtown streets and a stop at the Canadian National Exhibition, no missionaries were spotted.

Nevertheless, that didn't mean things were quiet. There were several developments, including:

- Jews for Jesus have reached thousands of people with their literature. The group has reportedly printed 300,000 brochures for the three-week blitz in Toronto.
- Jews for Judaism is mailing 55,000 copies of an eight-page booklet titled "Missionary Impossible," which details what Jews for Jesus is about and how to respond to them. About 27,000 copies were inserted in last week's CJN.
- Missionaries went door to door in Thornhill late last week, handing out invitations to view Survivor Stories, a Jews for Jesus-produced film, with separate English and Russian versions, documenting the "born again" experiences of Holocaust survivors. Jews for Judaism plans "a presence" outside the venues where the film will be shown. But because it is being screened on Friday nights and Saturdays, it limits the Jewish response.
- Jews for Judaism reports that several Jewish-sounding surnames, including "Katz," were the targets of telephone calls from Jews for Jesus last week.
- Jews for Judaism is asking all rabbis in the city to set aside Sept. 6 as a "Stand Up For Judaism" Shabbat. All pulpit rabbis in the Greater Toronto Area have received educational and other background material about Jews for Jesus. To date, about 30 synagogues have agreed to alert their members.
- A community-wide rally is slated for Sept. 7, 8 p.m. at 788 Marlee Ave., featuring a one-time missionary leader who has since converted to Judaism, as well as Rabbi Bentzion Kravitz, founding director of Jews for Judaism. Both men are also scheduled to lecture in area Jewish day schools.
- B'nai Brith Canada became involved in the controversy for the first time. The group last week called a press conference to announce its "Proud to be Jewish" campaign.

Charles McVety, president of the evangelical Canada Christian College, told reporters the idea of preaching Christianity "under the guise of Judaism to those who are in fact seeking Judaism, is plainly wrong.

"We unequivocally denounce any and all deceptive tactics and declare that our friends have every right to be 'Proud to be Jewish,'" McVety said at the press conference.

B'nai Brith announced a telephone hotline to answer concerns and questions. Call 1-800-892-2624.

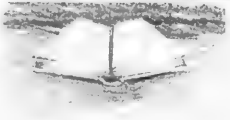
Jewish Life

You're insane. It's OK: you're Jewish

By RABBI MOISHE NEW



Rabbinic Reflections

Providence led me this past spring to lead a daily prayer service in one of Montreal's Jewish high schools. A number of the students had participated in the March of the Living program and I was the first to greet them in school when they returned from their sojourn in Poland and Israel.

The students returned with a deeper spiritual identity, which for many manifested itself in a newly found passion for observing mitzvot. I was curious to know what place or moment was responsible, more than any other, for this outpouring of the soul.

The answers shocked me. "Auschwitz." "The Kaddish at Auschwitz."

A few weeks later, several of the students came to my synagogue for Shabbat morning services. In my sermon, I related the aforementioned comments and posed the obvious question: How is it possible for one to discover a new level of faith in God at Auschwitz?

I explained that the Kaddish prayer expresses our faith in God's promise of a perfect world. Underlying the prayer is the doctrine that God has a plan, that life is sacred and that He governs His world justly.

And so I said: If there is one place on earth whose very existence protests the notion of justice, if there is one word that renders the whole concept of purpose in life meaningless, it is Auschwitz. Faith out of Auschwitz?

We are insanely Jewish, I concluded.

I ventured to suggest that the source of our insanity is the Almighty Himself. Our souls are a part of Him. And so in the same way that He cannot be explained, so too, one cannot explain the mystery of being a Jew.

Among the congregation was a man I'll call Mr. G., a guest at a simchah that was being celebrated that morning. Mr. G. is a Holocaust survivor.

Several weeks later, I attended the inauguration of Montreal's new Holocaust Memorial Museum. I had to give a class that evening and had to leave before the program ended. Slowly making my way out of the darkened auditorium, I noticed Mr. G. sitting at the end of the last row, near the exit where I was headed. I respectfully nodded my head in greeting. As I passed him, he grasped my sleeve, looked at me and with a smile that I cannot describe, whispered, "Crazy."

What do you say about a Jewish British soldier who has suffered from depression all of his life, despite having been decorated by the British government as a hero of the Great War?

During one of the war's fiercest battles, he fought in a hand-to-hand struggle to the death, using every last ounce of strength, and succeeded in overcoming his foe. As he sank to his knees, with his final breath, the German uttered the Shema Yisrael.

Never mind that the family histories of these two soldiers traced back centuries in Britain and Germany. Never mind that culturally they were an ocean apart. Never mind that they both swore absolute allegiance to the countries of their birth, of which they were proud citizens and for which they were ready to give their lives. Never mind that as soldiers on the front, their all-consuming objective was to annihilate the enemy.

Never mind all that. A Jew killed a Jew.

OK. We are insanely Jewish. And therefore…?

Well, to begin with, since a) insanity is hereditary and b) it is incurable, we ought to love our fellow Jew insanely (every Jew, regardless of how normal he or she may appear to be). For no reason. For no justification. Just because he or she is.

A final thought. The upshot of being crazy is that one's behaviour requires no rationalization.

So if you turn around one day out of the blue and decide, "I'm going to keep kosher." Or "I'm going to start keeping Shabbat." Or whatever. Don't worry. It's fine. You're OK.

You're Jewish.

Social unrest not linked to bad education

By DR. ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

For those who bemoan the good old days, a time when children allegedly respected their parents and teenagers spent their hours in productive labour and sinless pursuits, I offer Shakespeare's sociological appraisal of late adolescence and early adulthood, courtesy of The Winter's Tale: "I would there were no age between 16 and three-and-twenty… ; for there is nothing in the between but getting wenches with child, wronging the ancientry, stealing, fighting."

Hmmm. Sounds like a slightly extreme version of many a recent newspaper op-ed column, save for the fact that it was written 400 years ago. In every age, how to deal with youth has been a perpetual source of concern.

For some, the temptation of Shakespeare's comic implication – can't we just skip over a few years and parachute my teenager straight into the maturity of being 24 – is very real.

On the institutional level of a given school's administration and faculty, the question becomes whether children – of all ages – are viewed as a populace to be controlled and restrained long enough to feed the requisite quota of information and then passed along with a sigh of relief; or as creative and unique individuals with their own learning styles, where the job at hand is, in the words of Jacques Barzun, "the unfolding of the person, the development of native gifts through the free but guided activity of the self."

Between these two somewhat stereotypical poles are multiple shades of grey. Unlike Bob Dylan's hilarious warning, "Look out kids, they keep it all hid," the fundamental attitude of many teachers can be seen quite easily within the first 24 hours of the school year.

The idea that all social unrest stems from bad education is a canard that does not bear much scrutiny, but it was a belief that inspired a 19th-century pioneer of schooling, Friedrich Froebel. Convinced that a child was like a plant that needed freedom in order to grow properly, in the 1830s, he coined the rather infelicitous term Kleinkinderbeschaftigungsanstalt, before mercifully shortening it to Kindergarten, a phrase that used a botanical allusion to indicate the appropriate path for education. Advocating such "revolutionary" curricular notions as paper cutting, moulding clay and toys "suggestive of the unity of the world," Froebel's harmless innovations received a chorus of disapproval and his school closed quickly. Now, of course, the notion that play is serious business and fundamental to a child's growth, and that a student's self-expression is intrinsic to her social and intellectual evolution, is hardly disputed.

The new school (and Jewish) year brings with it a perennial sense of optimism and its dark half-brother, dread, the former because of a recurring sense of hope that this is the year when the child can sprout and fully realize all of the inchoate ability encompassed in that shadowy word "potential," and the latter because of a suspicion that such potential will, yet again, go unrealized. Perhaps a less grandiose dichotomy is called for, and like Froebel's beloved flora, the child can be observed as neither failing nor fully succeeding all at once, but rather inching his or her way out of the ground toward the still distant but clearly visible light.

Jewish Life

Intermarriage just a symptom

Books
Bernard Baskin

Why Marry Jewish?* by Doron Kornbluth,Targum Press Inc., $15.95 US.

In our modern, liberal, open-minded society, why should Jews marry Jews? Actually, a clear majority of Jews already marry non-Jews. In North America, the intermarriage rate has risen to 52 per cent. In Vancouver, it's 75 per cent. Intermarriage has become so acceptable that even to suggest that it might be deplorable or regrettable is considered backward or even racist.

This paperback volume, lucidly written and convincingly argued, offers a variety of compelling reasons against intermarriage.

In the first place, mixed marriages have a higher rate of divorce then others. When you add the differences in family background, religious upbringing, cultural traditions and the pull of family and friends, the incidence of divorce rises sharply.

In the second place, the statistical evidence in one study after another is clear and convincing: only a small minority of the children of intermarriage will consider themselves to be Jews. Only a minuscule percentage will marry Jews and encourage their children to identify and marry Jewishly.

Whether it happens to the children or the grandchildren of the couple in question, intermarriage almost inevitably leads to the complete loss of a family's Jewish heritage. At most, only 18 per cent of the children of intermarried couples are being reared as "Jewish only," and even this minority celebrates Christmas more than Passover.

"The most difficult issues concern children," Kornbluth writes. "In many cases, the non-Jewish partner can be convinced to let a baby boy have a circumcision. But how does one then object to a baptism? Similarly, will there be a christening? What religious school will the kids go to, if any? Will the kids be brought up in one religion or both? Will your kids know how to read Hebrew? Will they know Christian prayers? Will the family celebrate Chanukah? Christmas? What about the other holidays? Will there be a bar or bat mitzvah? What if the kids start liking one tradition better than the other? Perhaps most importantly, what happens if parental feelings on these crucial issues change, as they often do?"

Without a firm commitment to Judaism, the children and grandchildren of intermarriage are left with a vague concern for Israel, nostalgia, fear of anti-Semitism and a kind of liberal universalism. You can't expect to have continuity if Jews know little about what they want to continue.

When all is said and done, intermarriage is only a symptom of the real culprit – the lack of Jewish knowledge and commitment. Jewish literacy has declined tremendously over the last two generations. Within the last 35 years, synagogue affiliation has dropped from 60 per cent of American Jews to 40 per cent. The number of Jewish children receiving Jewish educations has dropped from 600,000 in 1962 to 440,000 in 1990. Jews know much less and do much less in an active way than they did even a generation ago.

The Jewish community adds connections to our lives. Identification with our past and our dreams for the future give depth to our existence in the world. For many of us, being Jewish may be a wonderful, important, enjoyable gift. Yet so few know about Judaism or enjoy it.

That is the core problem. Intermarriage is nothing more than a result of the reality.

Christian and Jewish attitudes towards intermarriage are very different. This is partially due to the fact that the number of Jews is dwindling, while the number of Christians is not.

Kornbluth doesn't scold, preach or berate as he offers helpful advice and information to complacent parents, their troubled offspring and others on a problem of inestimable importance.

Search for family and friends, part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

If you ever volunteered in Israel, spent time at summer camp or belonged to a Hillel group, there's probably someone you'd love to get in touch with after all these years – if only you knew how to find them. With some work and a bit of luck, the Internet can make your search much easier. So, whether you're trying to find an old friend – or an old flame – here's where to start looking.

The Lost Amigos Web site is one of many where you can search for friends by location, institution or the name of the person you're trying to find. For example, when I searched for the word "kibbutz," I found hundreds of people who are looking to reunite with friends that they met anywhere from Kibbutz Afeq to Kibbutz Zikim. You can browse Lost Amigos as much as you wish. If you want to add information about yourself or someone you're looking for, then you will need to register. There is no fee [http://www.lostamigos.net/].

Although there is no central directory for kibbutz volunteers, there are several great sites created by kibbutz alumni, such as those at Kibbutz Reshafim [http://terraflex.co.il/kibbutz/ex-volunteers.htm]. You'll find more links at the Kibbutz Ex Volunteer Association [http://www.geocities. com/kibbutzeva/keva4.html].

Need more kibbutz information? You can find Hebrew only information about every kibbutz in Israel at [http://makeashorterlink.com/?Y25F22E8 5]. Click on the "chipoos" (search) button on the search form and you'll get a list of 276 kibbutzim.

Harvard Hillel Alumni have a place they can call their own [http://hillel.harvard.edu/alumni.asp] as do alumni of Birthright Israel. Just register and connect [http://makeashorterlink. com/?I2 08151A5]. Also check out Jewish Reunion [http ://www.jewishreunion.co.uk/].

If you are trying to track someone down in Israel, the Bezeq phone company has created an excellent online phone book. Although this Hebrew-only directory is designed primarily for people with Hebrew keyboards, it's still very accessible to the rest of us. When you click on the "makledet virtualit" (virtual keyboard) icon, a little keyboard opens on your screen that allows you to tap in the Hebrew alphabet. Choose the region of the country for your search and you may find your long-lost friend or relative [http://www.144.bezek.com].

And here's a reminder. You can save yourself a lot of frustration when you are trying to read Hebrew Web pages by downloading the free browser Mozilla [http://mozilla.org]. While some browsers display Hebrew pages as a mess of indecipherable squiggles, Mozilla does an excellent job of displaying everything from aleph to taf.

Since there is no definitive directory of Internet users, you'll probably need to hunt through several sources until you succeed. To get you on your way, I highly recommend a site called JournalismNet.com. Though this site is geared toward journalists, if you are trying to locate someone, you'll appreciate the having the best people-finding links in one location [http://www. journalismnet.com/people/].

Long before there were computers, there was "Jewish geography," that pastime where Jews from far-flung corners of the globe would try to find out whom they know in common. See if you can find someone you know at Jewish Geography, the Web site [http://www.jewishgeography.org/].

Why are Jews so fascinated by Jewish geography? After moving to San Antonio, Tex., the game became more enjoyable and important for Rabbi B. Allison Bergman Vann. "I believe that Jewish geography is fun because it underlines the amazing connections that we have in our lives. Relationships help us to put the picture of our lives together… Our lives and the relationships in them are like puzzles. We build the picture of our life piece by piece, receiving and giving pieces, all the time." Rabbi Vahn then quotes Rabbi Lawrence Kushner [http://www.beth-elsa.org/abv091302.htm]:

Everyone carries with them at least one and probably
Many pieces to someone else's puzzle.
Sometimes they know it. Sometimes they don't.
And when you present your piece
Which is worthless to you,
To another, whether you know it or not,
Whether they know it or not,
You are a messenger from the Most High.

Dateline NBC viewers laughed when they said hypnosis… They're not laughing anymore!

Dateline NBC recently aired its follow-up to the "Ultimate Diet Challenge" and guess who is closest to his goal weight? That's right: the client who chose hypnosis, Marc Merlis, who is now exactly 8 lbs. away from his goal!

Dateline put the major diet plans to the test with six members of the Class of 1978. Each participant wanted to lose weight before their 25th high school reunion. Like thousands of others, Bakery Chef Mark Merlis found that hypnosis made all the difference.

Hypnosis client makes greatest progress

Dateline reports, "As for the hypnotized baker, things couldn't be better. By April he had lost almost five inches off his waist. And look who else caught the fever. His wife went to the hypnotist to quit smoking. And guess what? She says she no longer has the desire to smoke. Smoke free, fat free, the Merlises are flying..."

More and more former dieters are turning to hypnosis and, like Marc, are discovering that it's more effective than the leading weight loss shake, safer than a bacon-cheeseburger protein diet, less painful than training for a marathon, and doesn't involve counting points, calories, or a yo-yo diet.

If you're ready to take back control, and change the behaviours that caused you to gain weight in the first place, call Positive Changes Hypnosis and ask to schedule your FREE Weight Loss Consultation. You can begin your own success story TODAY!

Direct link between attacks and PA television: watchdog

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The Palestinian Authority (PA) is responsible for last week's bus bombing in Jerusalem because for two years, its television network ran daily messages that glorified the killing of Jews, said Itamar Marcus, head of an independent Jerusalem-based organization Palestinian Media Watch (PMW).

Marcus, who was guest speaker at a fundraiser for the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR), said TV "brainwashing" has been toned down in the past months due to U.S. pressure, but the PA continues to indoctrinate young people through other means.

"They are just trying to hide it more," he said.

For example, he said, a boys' soccer tournament in January was named after Abd Al-Baset Odeh, the suicide bomber responsible for the terrorist attack in a hotel in Netanya on Passover in March 2002. As well, a summer camp for girls was named for Wafa Idris, the first female suicide bomber. And at a high school graduation ceremony in July, young people danced to a song that claims Haifa, Lod and other cities in Israel proper "belong" to them.

Since the founding of PMW in 1996, Marcus has monitored the Palestinian media daily, going through every section of its newspapers, including the sports pages and crossword puzzles. (He once found a clue referring to a Jewish centre for commemorating the "lies" of the Holocaust. The answer was Yad Vashem.) PMW also scrutinizes Palestinian schoolbooks. The translations are done mainly by former Israeli army intelligence personnel.

Marcus's goal is to show the world the disparity between what the PA says in English to the West and what it says to its own people in Arabic.

The PA has been promoting a "genocidal" message through its media that the Jews must be exterminated, he said.

"If this was just a border conflict, it would have been solved a long time ago."

His video presentation of clips from "mainstream" PA TV during 2001-2002 illustrated how children were urged to aspire to shahada (martyrdom) and told that Jews must be killed. Jews are criticized, not for their policies, but because they are "inherently evil" and the enemies of Islam, he said.

"This is the lethal combination that led to what happened in Jerusalem," said Marcus, a former member of a trilateral committee formed to monitor incitement under the Wye accords.

He showed clips from PA television that claim all of Israel proper belongs to the Palestinians, not just the West Bank and Gaza. Jews are referred to as liars and murderers, and their claims on the land of Israel are labelled false by religious leaders and academics.

Marcus, who has brought such evidence before the European, French, British and Australian parliaments and expects soon to appear before a U.S. Senate hearing, believes that unless there is a radical change in the PA's ideology, "we will be dealing for the next few years with [this type of terrorism], not just in Israel, but all of the West."

There is no "cycle of violence" between Israel and the Palestinians, he said.

"The suicide bombing has nothing to do with what Israel did," he said. "It was not retaliation for Israel killing one of the heads of Islamic Jihad. It is the result of the systematic indoctrination by the Palestinian leaders, media and schools."

The West misunderstands the Arab mindset, he said. "Unlike what Cherie Blair has said, that the suicide bombers are acting out of desperation, they are really acting out of aspiration."

In 2001 and 2002, music videos were shown daily, some aimed at pre-school-aged children, that glorified shahada as life's highest goal. The videos tell children how "sweet" shahada is, and not to be afraid to die for Allah because great rewards await them in heaven. One video re-enacts the death of Mohammed al-Dura, the 12-year-old Palestinian boy killed during an exchange of fire between Israeli soldiers and Palestinian gunmen in September 2000, and beckons other children not to fear joining him.

In an "interview" with a group of 11- and 12-year-old girls aired in June 2002, one girl says shahada is better than obtaining peace or rights.

"Three different polls have shown that 70 to 80 per cent of Palestinian children aspire to shahada," Marcus said. "That is 700,000-800,000 children who do not fear death as a martyr. And Palestinian youth are being brought up today being told that the final chapter in the story is the destruction of Israel."

A change in attitude will only come if the countries that support the Palestinians threaten to withhold their funding and vote against them at the United Nations, Marcus said.

"Then it would stop overnight."

Media blame Israel for hudna's collapse

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

Reviewing media coverage following the Aug. 21 killing of Hamas leader Abu Shanab, one could readily conclude that Israel was to blame for the collapse of the Palestinian hudna or "ceasefire."

Lost in much of the verbiage was the fact that two days earlier, the hudna was effectively ended by Hamas and Islamic Jihad, when both claimed responsibility for the heinous suicide bombing of a bus filled with Orthodox families returning from a visit to the Western Wall.

Also missing was the fact that in the aftermath of this atrocity, Israel gave PA Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas, and his security chief Mohammad Dahlan, 24 hours to begin disarming and dismantling the terrorist organizations, as demanded by the road map peace plan. Both demurred, deferring instead to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, the person originally responsible for much of the violence and terrorism, including the co-opting of Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

Israel was left with no option but to act in genuine self-defence. And still it got blamed. A typical example: On Aug. 24, CNN Sunday Night anchor Andrea Koppel interviewed Christopher Dickey, Middle East regional editor for Newsweek.

Asked Koppel: "If you're the Bush administration, how do you get the road map back on track?"

Dickey placed the onus entirely on Israel: "I think the Bush administration is going to have to lean very hard on the Israeli government and on [Israeli Prime Minister] Ariel Sharon, to stop him from carrying out provocative actions, like the killing of those Hamas leaders, which everyone knows perfectly well will lead to suicide bombings and a cycle of violence."

To which Koppel added her own one-sided commentary: "And that's something that Ariel Sharon has made clear… he has no intention of doing any time soon."

Dickey, like so many others, has reversed cause and effect. The killing of Hamas leaders is Israel's response to – not the cause of – murderous bombings. No other nation would put up with what Israel has endured. No other nation would allow terrorist groups to use a self-imposed "ceasefire" to rearm and plan for more attacks.

Similarly, in a story carried prominently by the Toronto Star ("Israel kills three militants, promises more strikes," Aug. 23), Reuters' Ala Badarneh reported that Israel's killing of Palestinian "militants" has extended "a new spiral of violence that has smashed a ceasefire vital for a U.S.-backed 'road map' peace plan." Again, this is very misleading.

"Palestinian officials said the authority was prepared to disarm militant groups, preempt attacks against Israelis, close down some institutions affiliated with Hamas and Islamic Jihad," Badarneh wrote. But with one faint, qualified exception the day after the bus bombing in Jerusalem, Abbas and Dahlan repeatedly said there would be no disarming of Hamas. Badarneh deliberately omitted that fact, making it seem as though disarmament was the norm. Such reports are grossly deceptive.

The Star's Aug. 26 editorial, "Blowing Apart Mideast Peace," proclaimed what amounts to a "pox on both their houses," but missed an essential point. Israel is prepared for substantial compromise as long as the Palestinians fulfil the one essential precondition stipulated in the road map: Palestinian terrorist organizations must be dismantled. Until that happens, there cannot be any progress toward meaningful negotiation, let alone toward the creation of a viable Palestinian state.

Carleton U's Andrew Cohen: journalist and professor

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Academia

Andrew Cohen, a Carleton University professor of journalism and international relations, has written a lament for Canada. In a newly published book, While Canada Slept: How We Lost Our Place in the World (McClelland & Stewart), Cohen traces Canada's decline as a nation.

"By three principal measures – the power of its military, the generosity of its foreign aid, the quality of its foreign service – Canada is less effective than a generation ago," writes Cohen, a best-selling author and award-winning journalist who joined Carleton's staff two years ago.

In an interview, he hammers home the point: "We are not living up to our potential."

Canada, having stepped away from its "spirited internationalism," has been coasting on its reputation. After World War II, Cohen claims in this impassioned book, Canada had the world's fourth largest military, the finest foreign affairs ministry and a generous aid program.

But today all that is in the past, argues Cohen, a McGill University graduate who has worked for the Globe and Mail, the Financial Post, United Press International and the Ottawa Citizen.

Cohen, 48, believes that Canada can bounce back to its former glory. "We're a nation of resources and affluence, and we ought to be everything we can be in the world, and historically have been."

He attributes Canada's decline to a variety of factors, from globalization to a failure of vision.

Canada emerged from World War II with a sterling military record. "This was quite extraordinary for a country with a population of 11 million," he says.

In 1962, Canada's armed forces numbered 120,000. "Now we're half of that."

To Cohen, this is worth remembering because the army was always at Canada's beck and call. "We were an important peacemaker," he says, referring to Canada's role in United Nations peacekeeping missions. "It was part of our iconography."

But today, he says, "we refuse peacekeeping missions, and our role has been absorbed by many countries."

In his view, the problem can be fixed with an infusion of funds.

As a foreign assistance provider, Canada has slipped drastically since the 1970s. "We give aid to too many places. It's too broad and not deep enough."

From the 1920s to the 1950s, the Canadian diplomatic corps had few, if any, rivals. Canadian diplomats such as Hume Wrong, Norman Patterson and Lester Pearson, who won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1957, were virtually legends in their own time.

"We were very prominent in the formation of the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization," Cohen says.

But more than five decades on, Canada has lost its lustre. "We've allowed the foreign service to deteriorate, though there are a lot of good people in it."

Cohen suggests the Canadian media is partly at fault for Canada's diminishment as an influential middle power: they give Africa, South America and much of Europe short shrift.

"The coverage is fitful, inchoate and incomplete. For a country that generates 40 per cent of its wealth from foreign trade, you'd think that the media would be more interested in global politics."

Cohen says all too often, Canadian newspapers carry wire service items rather than stories by their own correspondents. The reason is crystal clear, he says: "It's cheaper."

Andrew Cohen

But Cohen also saves some of his wrath for Canada's education system.

Six out of 10 provinces do not require students to take Canadian history, he says. As a result, the vast majority of Canadians are not familiar with Pearson's role in the creation of a UN peacekeeping force after the 1956 Arab-Israeli war.

"It's symptomatic of our national ignorance as a people," he says with a measure of disdain.

He is also critical of Canada's policy in the runup to the recent war in Iraq. "We chose the UN over the United States."

Canada should have lined up behind the United States in its campaign to unseat Saddam Hussein and his brutal Baathist regime, he says.

"We were wishy-washy, and in terms of style and substance, we handled the Iraq file badly."

Given the fact that Canada is governed by Liberal Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, whom he describes as parochial, Cohen says he was not all that surprised by Canada's position.

"When it comes to foreign affairs, he's not particularly well-travelled or well-read. His foreign policy adds up to very little."

As for the Arab-Israeli conflict, Cohen says, Canada's objective should be two-fold: to persuade Israel that the settlements in the territories are untenable and to convince the Palestinians that the right of return is unattainable.

Cohen, who is married to fellow journalist Mary Gooderham, comes from an old Montreal Jewish family. The Cohens were influential in the founding of the Canadian Jewish Congress and of Shaar HaShomayim Synagogue.

The father of two children, Alexander Elliot and Rachel Hannah, Cohen earned graduate degrees in journalism and political science at Carleton after graduating from McGill in 1977.

Entering journalism as a weekend copy boy at the Ottawa Citizen, he was soon covering the education, police and city beats. In 1980, United Press International hired him as a parliamentary correspondent. By 1983, he was an editor at UPI's foreign desk in Washington, D.C.

In 1994, after a decade on the Financial Post as a political writer, editor and columnist, Cohen went to work for the Globe and Mail. He wrote editorials, specializing in national and international politics and federal-provincial relations. He won National Newspaper Awards in 1995 and again in 1996.

From 1997 to 2001, he was based in Washington as the Globe's U.S. correspndent, covering the impeachment of former-U.S. president Bill Clinton and the disputed presidential election.

Before writing While Canada Slept, Cohen wrote a book about the failed Meech Lake accord and co-edited another book on former Canadian prime minister Pierre Trudeau.

Although he spends the bulk of his time teaching, Cohen writes a weekly column for the Ottawa Citizen, which runs in Canwest newspapers across Canada, and appears as an international affairs commentator on radio and television.

Jewish gay group celebrates first birthday

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The placards had a distinctive ring to them.

"One in every minyan," read one. Another read, "I had to come out of the closet. My mother needed the space."

Fourteen members of Feygelah, Montreal's newest Jewish organization for gays, marched at the recent Divers/Cité gay pride parade down René Lévesque Boulevard, carrying an Israeli flag bathed in the gay pride rainbow. The group, which also participated in this year's March to Jerusalem/Israel Day, is making its presence known here.

For Matthew Gore, it was an important moment. A year ago this July, Gore founded Feygelah in response to a gap in services for the Jewish gay community. Montreal has not had a Jewish gay group since its predecessor, Yachdav, disbanded seven years ago. An earlier group, Nachas, stopped operating in the 1980s.

In an interview, the 20-year-old student at Marianopolis College who begins studying at McGill University this winter said he wanted to create an organization that would serve as an umbrella group for Montreal Jewish gays, lesbians, bisexuals, trans-gendered and transsexuals. More important, he said, he wanted it to be an integral part of the Jewish community.

"I thought to myself: 'Look, there is no Jewish gay group, so why not start one?' It is important for us, and for the Jewish community at large, to give Jewish gays a voice. I know a lot of Jewish gays and they are full-functioning members of the community."

Gore deliberately adopted a controversial name for the group, a Yiddish term some Jews use disparagingly – feygelah literally means "little bird" – to emphasize that there should not be any stigma attached to being gay.

"It's similar to using the word 'queer,'" Gore said. "That was once a put-down, but now it's a term of pride. I wanted it to be a public word."

So far, Gore said, Feygelah has done well. Its mailing list is close to 200 and it also has a Web site, www.feygelah.org. The organization is putting its name out there, working to become socially active and more involved in Jewish community events. Feygelah is in contact with other gay groups internationally, including one in Israel, and plans are for it to become more "political" as it evolves, Gore said.

Yet Gore said Feygelah is still experiencing reactions that range from awkwardness to homophobia in its dealings with the Jewish community.

"At the March to Jerusalem, a woman came up to me and asked me if I'd seen a rabbi who could help me," Gore said.

"The thing is, you don't have to be gay to support us, to support what we are trying to do."

Given the recent court decisions in Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia that have ruled to lift the federal ban on gay marriage, and the recent rulings in Ontario and B.C. in favour of gay marriage, gay rights are not far from the surface these days.

In Montreal's Jewish community, where the majority of synagogues are affiliated with the Orthodox movement, gay marriage is a non-starter. Only the Reform Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom, which is the meeting place for PFFLAG – Parents, Friends and Family of Lesbians and Gays – is open to the concept, Gore said.

After the court decision, the Jewish Community Council wrote a letter of protest to Canadian politicans.

"The official Jewish position [in Montreal] is against it, while other cities have gay synagogues," Gore said.

"I don't know if the Jewish community here is more homophobic than any other, but I do know that it will be a lot more difficult here [to get support for gay marriage].

"The biggest struggle is to get rabbis and organizations to be more sensitive to the issue [of a Jewish gay presence] and to see us as full members of the community.

"The more common attitude is, 'We love the sinners but hate the sins.'"

More upsetting, Gore said, is the belief in certain circles that gays can be turned straight through "conversion therapy."

That is a "dangerous" notion that will lead to endless torment for those "converted" and something more likely "to deepen homophobia in the community," he said.

Gore's own path to acceptance didn't have these obstacles. When he came out of the closet three years ago, his family – father Brian, mother Yvonne and sisters Natalie and Karine – accepted it and were supportive, after a period of adjustment.

Gore said being gay in 2003 is a lot easier than it was years ago, even though he and other gays were harassed verbally at the Westmount private high school he attended.

"It wasn't so much the name-calling," Gore said, "but the fact that the institution did nothing to protect gay kids. It was horrible."

Gore said Feygelah will continue to bring its message of tolerance to the Jewish community and to the community at large, and to work toward expanding and thriving.

"There's a lot of work to be done," he said.

Zoo removes offending Jewish symbols

MONTREAL –Granby Zoo agreed to remove two items with Jewish symbolism from an exhibit on endangered species following a complaint from Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

Yvan Vaillancourt, the zoo's director, understood the Jewish community's sensitivity and agreed to have ornaments made of a rare tortoise shell in the shapes of a Star of David and a challah taken off display, said CJC Quebec region executive director David Birnbaum.

CJC was acting on a concern expressed by a member of the Montreal Jewish community who had visited the zoo and had seen the items. They were shown as examples of the exploitation of the products of animals facing extinction.

CJC phoned Vaillancourt to explain that displaying such symbols may leave the impression that Jews are insensitive to a major ethical issue like protecting endangered species, Birnbaum said.

"We were determined to get this fixed. Small symbolic things like that can feed anti-Semitism. And, in fact, the use of such materials is not a Jewish practice.

"He immediately understood and promised to have them removed right away," Birnbaum said.

CJC did not ask about the origin of the items.

NORTH OF HIGHWAY 7: The last 100 years of Jewish life in the Toronto area can be traced from Kensington to Bathurst Manor to Richmond Hill. The next wave of Jewish migration may be further north, into Simcoe County. Long considered cottage country, the Barrie area is now the permanent home of at least 80 Jewish families, and more are arriving. The advantages: lower overhead and housing costs, less traffic and better access to recreation. Now, Congregation Am Shalom, the newest member of the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism, is building Simcoe County's first full-time synagogue (seen above). The Jewish community has raised more than $1 million in two years for the building in Barrie's south end. Scheduled to open this fall, we welcome new members. שישאר בינינו

מה יהיה

המצב בארץ נראה כמו משוואה שאין לה פתרון. הפיגועים מוכיחים שוב ושוב שאין שליטה פלשתינאית בשטח, ושהג'יהד והחמאס יעשו הכל להבטיח ששלום יהיה בלתי אפשרי. כל פעולת תגמול ישראלית מביאה לעוד פעולות טרור נגד ישראלים, ובסך הכל אין פתרון. כשאנשים מוכנים להתפוצץ כדי להרוג יהודים- אין שום כוח הרתעה.

קסם על ים כינרת
בשמי התכלת ירח שט.
על גלי כסף ירק מזהרת
בין גלים, ענים, איפה את?
יפה את כמו אי כינרת
אעם את באת לשם חברת.
שלב ה"ע, היית שלנו
יוסי ואהבה אלינו סיכרת

Dirty Pretty Things

עוד סרט בריטי בשיתוף הבי.בי.סי. במרכזו היחסים שבין שני מהגרים בלונדון- רופא ניגרי צעיר ובחורה רוסיה ויפה שנפגשים במלון לונדוני בו שניהם עובדים בלתי חוקית. בהדרגה מסתבר לך שאינך צופה בסרט נשמה או סרט אופי, אלא במותחן קלאסי. אני לא מתכוון להסגיר לכם כלום שיקלקל את ההפתעה, אבל מדובר בסרט מדהים, גם בעלילה, גם ביחסים בין הדמויות וגם בטיפול בבעיית המהגרים. אין מה לעשות- לפחות לטעם שלי הבריטים הם גזע עליון בסרטים. לעומתם הרבה סרטים הוליבודיים נראים כמו מעשיות לילדים לא כל כך אינטלגנטים. עשר בסולם קורן.

Montreal women promote Israeli health products

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Israel may be known abroad for its high-tech prowess, but two Montreal women are spreading the word about another type of Israeli inventiveness: health products that are all-natural and often based on ancient remedies.

Dr. Milli Raviv and Yael Shahin, both originally from Israel, wanted to do something to help Israel's ailing economy. Since they are both working in the health field and visit Israel frequently, they decided to try to find a market for unusual Israeli products developed using scientific research.

They call their company Ivam – the initials of the names of Shahin's four children. They sell worldwide through their Web site (www.ivamgroup.com).

One of their finds is a topical treatment for fungal infections of the nails called Sephorris, which is said to be 100 per cent natural and effective.

Raviv, a dentist and natural health therapist, calls it a "miracle." Shahin, who works as a nurse with her doctor husband is equally enthusiastic.

The conventional treatment for nail infections is prescription drugs such as Lamisil and Sporanox that may have to be taken for up to six months and often have unpleasant side effects, Raviv said. There is also a risk to liver function associated with long-term use of these medications. The cure rate is, at best, 80 per cent and recurrence is common.

The Israeli anti-fungal treatment, developed at Tapuach Natural Technologies Ltd. in the Judean Desert near the Dead Sea, is made from the essential oils of thyme, oregano and cinnamon, which have anti-fungal and anti-bacterial properties that penetrate the nail. Herbs grown in the desert have a particularly high concentration of the active components because of the dryness and cool nights.

Sephorris is a liquid that is applied like nail polish on fingers or toes and comes in a bottle with a brush.

It is applied twice a day for 10 days, then once a day for the next 10 days. Following a recess of two weeks, the same cycle is repeated. Treatment is stopped for two weeks to avoid the development of resistance by the fungi.

If the fungal problem is less than two years old, two cycles may be enough for a cure, Raviv said. Otherwise, the cycle is repeated. Most patients have been found to have significant improvement after seven weeks.

The only possible side effect is reddening or blistering of the skin. To avoid that, petroleum jelly is applied as a protection.

The Israeli product has been tested both in vitro and on hundreds of volunteers, according to its manufacturers.

Another discovery of the duo is a deodorant called Lavilin, which lasts up to two weeks, even withstanding bathing and strenuous physical activity. Developed at Hlavin Cosmetics Laboratories, the deodorant cream is derived from the herbal flowers arnica and calendula, and is alcohol- and aluminum-free.

These anti-bacterial flowers have been used since ancient times for their soothing and healing properties. Lavilin's makers say it works by neutralizing odor not by masking it.

A study by the Heller Institute for Medical Research at Tel Aviv's Tel Hashomer Hospital tested the deodorant on 100 people under different conditions, hot and humid or hot and dry. A single application worked for four to 15 days, no irritation was caused to the skin and clothing did not fade.

An application is described as roughly the size of a drop of water. Creams are available for either underarm or foot use.

Yet another natural remedy is Help-S, a lip gel that relieves sores and fever blisters; it has a world patent pending. Developed by Hadas Natural Products, the gel is based on a variety of herbal and plant extracts.

These include melissae, propolis, vicia faba and echinacea, which are said to be anti-viral; chamomile and aloe vera that are anti-inflammatory; calendula (also used in the deodorant), for its wound-healing and anti-inflammatory properties; and vitamin E for its healing effect.

Help-S is said to be effective where resistance to regular treatments has developed.

Ivam also has health foods, such as carob and nut spreads, and novelty items, like a toothbrush with enough paste in the handle for 30 brushings, which is made at a kibbutz.

Shahin said orders for Ivam's line (the deodorant is the most popular item) have come from around the world, including Nigeria and Sri Lanka. "People in many places would probably otherwise not buy from Israel, but they are not worried about receiving a package from Canada."

Ivam has so far been a labour of love for Raviv and Shahin. Proceeds have gone into paying for shipping in other products and for promotion. They have been encouraging Jewish schools to use Israeli wares for fundraising, in the hope that parents will buy other Israeli products. The Shaar Hashomayim gift shop is also displaying some products, and IGA in Cavendish Mall is now stocking the carob spreads.

On Sept. 3, Raviv and Shahin will be in Toronto for an event organized by the Israeli Trade Commission where they will meet with outlets that might be interested in selling the products.

Salads save valuable time for the great outdoors

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

Pasta salads come to the rescue when the sun is out and we all want to get out of the kitchen as quickly as possible. No need to turn on the oven – just cook the pasta briefly in boiling water, mix with a few ingredients and you have an easy side dish or main course that appeals to most people.

Variations are endless: pasta comes in hundreds of delightful shapes and sizes – from penne to seashells, fusilli to linguine – any of which can play a starring role in your pasta salad creation.

The sky's the limit when it comes to what a pasta salad can be: a main course, a side-dish or even a dessert (I recently threw together a Shabbat dessert salad of fusilli, oil, vinegar and raisins that was gobbled up by all).

Pasta salad can star seasonal fresh vegetables (even canned or frozen), fruit or even proteins, such as cheese, hard-boiled eggs, tuna and leftover cubes or shreds of chicken or beef.

Let your imagination run wild, and remember that you can almost always substitute different types of pasta, according to what you have in your cupboard.

TOMATO PASTA SALAD

8 oz. sea shell or wagon-wheel pasta
2 large peeled tomatoes, coarsely chopped
1 small onion, very thinly sliced
2 medium cloves of garlic, minced
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 tbsp. white wine vinegar (or regular vinegar)
1 tsp. dried oregano
salt and pepper to taste
1/2 cup grated parmesan cheese, (optional)

Cook pasta as directed on package or until al dente. Rinse immediately in cold water and drain well. Mix in tomatoes, onion and garlic. Add olive oil, vinegar and seasonings and combine thoroughly, but gently.

Chill in a covered container in refrigerator. Before serving, toss again and add optional cheese. Makes 6 to 8 side servings.

GREEK PASTA SALAD

8 oz. penne
1/2 pint cherry tomatoes, stemmed and halved
1 medium red bell pepper, seeded and cubed
1 small red onion, diced
1/2 cup sliced celery
1/3 cup pitted, halved black olives
2 tbsp. chopped Italian parsley
1 tbsp. chopped fresh mint (optional)
1/2 tsp. dried oregano
4 oz. feta cheese, cubed
black pepper (to taste)
1/3 cup olive oil

Cook penne according to package directions until al dente. Drain well and place in a large bowl. Add remaining ingredients and gently toss with olive oil and pasta. Refrigerate or serve immediately. Serves 6-8 as a side dish.

HONEYED PASTA-FRUIT SALAD

1 1/2 cups rotini
1/2 cup raisins
1 cup halved seedless grapes
3 peaches (peeled, if desired), roughly chopped
1/2 cup sliced celery
1/4 cup chopped walnuts
1 8-oz. container of soft cream cheese
1 cup vanilla or plain low-fat yogurt
2-3 tbsp. honey
1/ tsp. shredded lemon peel
2 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tbsp. whipping cream (optional)

Cook pasta according to package directions; drain and cool. Combine raisins, grapes, peaches, celery, walnuts and cooled pasta in a large bowl.

Combine cream cheese, yogurt, honey, lemon peel and lemon juice. Beat with an electric mixer on medium speed until well mixed and nearly smooth. Stir in whipping cream.

Pour dressing over pasta mixture and stir to coat. Cover and chill for 2 to 6 hours. Stir in a little milk to moisten, if necessary. Serves 6 to 8 as a side dish.

We must deal with the reality of inter-religious dating

By ALIZA CRAIMER
Special to The CJN

Last spring, I took a break from my usual potluck Shabbat dinner to go to the Oxford Chabad house for a talk titled, "Is the ban on inter-religious dating out of date?" Surprisingly, the answer was no.

Guest Voice

The rabbi suggested the main reason why people intermarry is a lack of Jewish self-esteem. By this, he meant that people who intermarry believe they have little of value to contribute to the Jewish people due to their lack of Jewish knowledge or observance, and thus, don't feel they count.

As he spoke, another explanation resounded in my head: What about the people who feel they do count, who are Jewishly literate and who want to marry someone Jewish, but can't find Mr. or Ms. Jewish Right?

In the past three months, I have listened to the agonies of three Jewish female friends who have non-Jewish boyfriends. Each of them has said the same thing: "In an ideal world, I'd be with someone Jewish, but..."

Maybe it would surprise most people to know that these are affiliated Jews who are proud of their Jewish identity and are struggling to reconcile this fundamental part of who they are with their choice of boyfriends. They worry about what will happen if they marry a non-Jew, feel guilty and struggle with the dilemma of wanting to be with someone Jewish but not finding him.

"I want to be with someone Jewish, but this person makes me happy, we have the same values, and after all these years I have never met a Jewish guy as great as him. I'm not going to reject a wonderful man for a dream that might never come true," they say.

There must be appealing Jewish guys out there, but many of us Jewish girls are having trouble finding them. For their part, a lot of Jewish guys have similar difficulties. There seems to be a basic problem of having the will – the desire to be with someone Jewish – but not having a way.

Although I believe that if the will is strong enough, a way will be found, the difficulty in matching up the two may explain the proliferation of Jewish dating services on the Internet. Although I've heard of several success stories, many of my Jewish friends feel uncomfortable with the idea of meeting their future love this way. Personally, I've thought to myself, "Well, maybe if I'm still single in 10 years, I'll give it a shot." Maybe I should "get with the times" and take advantage of technology, but the romantic voice in my head wants to meet Mr. Right the old-fashioned way. So the question remains for all us single Jews who want to have a Jewish partner. How do we find one?

Of course, Jews don't have a monopoly on the challenge of finding a needle in a haystack. Other minorities also struggle. A gay friend was complaining about how hard it is for him to meet Mr. Right. Try as I might to sympathize, I found myself saying, "At least you're dealing with 1 in 10 odds. In the Diaspora, I'm dealing with less than half a per cent!"

Thinking this way is depressing, so instead I look to a friend who has found a Jewish mate. Seeing them together gives me hope.

Last time I spoke with this couple about inter-religious dating, one of them proposed another theory about those who intermarry and those who refuse to tempt fate by dating non-Jews.

He suggested that people who only date Jews have a stronger feeling of collective responsibility. That is, they don't want to let the Jewish people down. They feel a strong connection to the past and it's important for them to help the Jewish people survive in the future. I think there's some truth to this hypothesis, but I can think of more positive inducements to marrying a member of the tribe.

This year especially, as I studied Jewish history and politics and became active in Jewish student life, I realized I couldn't spend my life with someone who doesn't understand Jewish culture, who won't be part of the Jewish life I want to lead and who will never be able to understand how I feel when I watch a film about the Holocaust or go to Israel.

One of my friends recently related that although her non-Jewish boyfriend tries, he doesn't understand how she feels about subtle anti-Semitic incidents. Another of my friends, after going on a trip to Israel, decided that being with someone Jewish is too important to her and broke up with her non-Jewish boyfriend.

Maybe in an ideal world, every Jewish single would find a Jewish mate. But this isn't an ideal world.

In any case, the friends I've mentioned do worry about their Jewish future – how they will live a Jewish life, raise Jewish children and not wind up ostracized from the Jewish community because of their choice of partners.

As much as we might not like it, inter-religious dating is a reality. Putting our heads in the sand or marginalizing the people who do it won't make it go away and will certainly not stop Jewish attrition.

As long as there are Jews who care about being Jewish, we have to find ways of making them and their partners feel welcome and connected to Judaism.

Ultimately, we need to find better ways for Jewish singles to connect so our children won't have to struggle with the same dilemmas.

Aliza Craimer is working on her master's degree in Jewish studies at Oxford University.

Canadians strengthen birthright israel

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

With an estimated 1,500 Canadian participants expected to be part of this winter's birthright israel trip following its most successful summer program ever, the 10-day educational tour of Israel is proving to be the most successful Israel Experience program in Canadian history.

In fact, close to 7,000 young Jewish Canadians have already taken advantage of this journey of self-discovery, since birthright israel was launched in Canada three years ago. Of those 7,000 young adults, 5,500 have travelled with Canada Israel Experience (CIE). This summer alone 1,500 Canadian Jewish men and women participated in the birthright israel program.

Since 2000, over 48,000 participants from approximately 30 countries have taken part in birthright israel and, of those, Canada has sent more than 7,000, or 14%. When the Palestinian campaign of violence against Israel began in September 2000, many communities shied away from sending their youth to Israel, but not Canada, which sent over 2,300 young adults – or 18% - of the total, on a birthright israel trip during 2001 alone.

"The Canadian Jewish community has consistently and proudly stood with Israel, especially during these past few difficult years," says Lorne Klemensberg, Director, Israel Programs, Canada-Israel Experience. "Canada's support for Israel is perhaps best reflected in the impressive number of Canadian birthright israel participants we have brought to Israel since 2000 amid the spate of Palestinian violence."

"When I went on birthright israel for the very first time, I was amazed by the transformation of the kids, regardless of their backgrounds," says Karen Morton, a founding Chair of birthright israel Canada. "There was something evident - right from the start - that made this program so unique, so powerful, and such an important life experience for these kids.It's all due to the efforts of people like Elizabeth Sokolsky and Adam Minsky in Toronto, and people on the ground in Israel like Lorne Klemensberg. I am so proud to be associated with birthright israel. I had no expectations when it started, but I know that it is vital to the future of the worldwide Jewish community."

According to Claudia Fleischer, who just returned home from her birthright israel trip, Israel proved a superb Jewish learning tool. "I couldn't believe how incredible this experience was," says the 20-year-old Thornhill resident. "All that history, walking in places and seeing sites where such monumental events took place thousands of years ago was absolutely unbelievable. We soaked it up like sponges. I understand so much more now about what it means to be Jewish, and where we came from, than I ever thought possible."

One of the more popular features of birthright israel is known as mifgash. Meaning "encounter," mifgash brings Canadians together with their Israeli counterparts – all of whom are currently Israeli soldiers.

"For many of us, mifgash had an especially meaningful and emotional impact," says Shaun Hoffman, an 18-year-old Torontonian. "We, as Jews, know that Israel is a luxury we cannot take for granted. To meet with these incredible young men and women who are responsible for defending this tiny nation amidst a sea of Arab nations, and really get to know them, laugh with them, cry with them, was unbelievably wonderful."

For 20-year-old Michael Mitnik of Toronto, the birthright israel experience was best defined by the following anecdote.

"We all trekked to the top of Masada early in the morning as the sun rose and once we got to the top, we all, in unison, shouted the word 'hope.' The echo that came back to us didn't even sound like our voices, what we all heard were the voices of past generations yelling it back to us. It was unreal," says Mitnik.

Bronfman mingles with bri participants

Charles R. Bronfman, the Canadian philanthropist behind birthright israel recently took time out of his schedule to spend a few hours chatting with Toronto participants whom he helped send to Israel. Bronfman got up close and personal with approximately 300 participants, as he addressed the group for Oneg Shabbat at the Southern Wall in the Old City. Later during the 10-day trip, he delivered a message of hope and solidarity to the group during an emotional visit to a military cemetery in Jerusalem.

"It is because of all of you here today that birthright israel lives. As you learn more about yourselves as Jews, and about your relationship with Israel, the future for all of us will be that much stronger," Bronfman told the group at Mount Herzel Military Cemetery.

Preparing for a busy winter

Following on the heels of its most successful summer birthright israel program ever, Canada-Israel Experience (CIE) birthright organizers are not resting on their laurels; quite the contrary as the winter program starts to heat up.

If you are between the ages of 18 and 26, and have still not taken part in a birthright israel trip, the upcoming winter program offers some new and exciting ways to enjoy Israel for 10 days absolutely free of charge. Here are your choices:

In November, there's a special UJA Federation "GAP" birthright israel trip with an itinerary especially for Graduates, Associates and Professionals aged 23-26. This age-specific trip is geared specifically for individuals who are interested in learning more about their own Jewish community and how they can become involved. This unique program will also include participation in the General Assembly (GA) of Jewish leaders from communities across North America and the opportunity to meet other young leaders from around the world.

Escape the December snow with the choice of two trips - the CIE birthright israel journey which offers you the sunrise at Masada, archeological digging in the Israeli desert, touring the Old City of Jerusalem, and rafting down the Jordan River, or the Anguish to Hope – Joint Poland/Israel Experience (ages 18-22), designed for university-aged individuals interested in traveling to both Israel and Europe and learning about the Holocaust. A boost for Israeli economy

The thousands of young Jewish adults who make their way to Israel on the 10-day birthright israel trip are not the only ones benefiting. In fact, using Israel's beauty as an outdoor classroom has also paid tremendous dividends for the Israeli economy.

Over 8,000 birthright israel participants from 25 countries and 190 campuses visited Israel as part of the 2003 birthright israel summer season. To date, birthright israel has infused approximately $70 million into the Israeli economy, an estimated $13.5 million this summer alone.

Perhaps nobody is happier to see these statistics than Avi Rosenthal, Director, Israel Hotel Association. "Tourism is a major branch of the Israel economy that has suffered a lot because of the geopolitical situation," says Rosenthal. "The increase in birthright israel tourists will perhaps bring us to a turning point where hotels can rehire staff and increase employment all over the country."

The expected financial contributions to the Israeli economy by birthright israel winter 2003 participants are:

- 70 airline flights, 95% of them on El Al
- 4,400 days of work for tour guides, security guards and medics
- 45,000 paid visits to Israeli tourism sites
- 67,500 overnights in Israeli hotels
- 135,000 meals
- $1.8 million in souvenir purchases

"Not only does the program contribute to Jewish solidarity with the State of Israel," adds Rosenthal, "but it has made a significant economic contribution to the country."

What is birthright israel?

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto sponsors the birthright israel initiative with the Government of Israel and a consortium of major international philanthropists. birthright israel provides Jewish young adults - ages 18 to 26 - with a free 10-day educational journey of discovery to Israel. Since its inception in 2000, over 48,000 have participated worldwide in birthright israel trips, close to 7,000 from Canada.

An inspiring experience

Many participants have called birthright israel a life-changing experience. For two young Canadian women, Johanna Herman and Jenny Hazan, that statement could not be truer.

The July 2002 trip taken by Johanna Herman, a 22-year-old Torontonian about to enter her fourth year at the University of Toronto, sparked a dormant passion for Israel and the Jewish community.

Since her visit to Israel, Herman became active in Israel advocacy, attending different conferences and workshops. She also became Chair of Hillel's Arts and Culture committee, a position that allowed her to bring Israel's artistic achievements to the spotlight. Herman has also been elected Public Relations Coordinator for Hillel at the University of Toronto.

Johanna Herman

"There are so many memorable experiences from birthright," says Herman. "The joyful ones include riding camels in the middle of the desert, climbing Masada, seeing the ancient ruins, visiting the Dead Sea and swimming in the Mediterranean. Other memories that carry so much meaning include visiting the Kotel for the first time, going to the Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum, seeing the Hall of Independence in Tel Aviv, and visiting the burial places of the Rabins and Golda Meir."

A passion for Israel is something that Jenny Hazan is actually living through.

Hazan, 26, grew up in St. Catharines, in one of the city's 160 Jewish families, before moving to Toronto. Despite the fact that her birthright israel experience was not originally her choice, she took it to the next level - by making aliyah.

"I had never even heard of birthright," says Hazan, a graduate of the journalism program at Queens University in Kingston, who moved to Israel in April 2003. "My dad had applied for me and my sister Lauran, and suddenly we were both going."

Jenny Hazan

Lauran, 28, followed in her footsteps and made aliyah in August of this year.

"My parents were afraid." says Hazan. "They thought that my boyfriend and I were going to get married. My sister was also seriously dating a non-Jewish guy. My whole family was falling apart."

With her boyfriend close to popping the question, Jenny left for Israel as part of the February 2001 birthright israel trip, and she's never looked back.

"Being in Israel gave me the opportunity to discover what my purpose was on this planet as a Jew," she says. "Israel is my country, my responsibility, these are my people. After birthright, I knew that assimilation was no longer an option – I could not possibly be responsible for hurting something that was already so fragile. I want to help to make Judaism stronger, not weaken it."

Still, at the beginning of Jenny's love affair with Israel, her mother needed a bit of convincing.

"Even during the intifadah, my mother would call me and ask me to get on a plane back to Toronto," says Hazan. "I told her 'no way.' I had become friends with people defending this country, how could I go back to Toronto? Then when she'd ask, 'so, when are you coming home?' I would tell her, 'mom, I am home, the question is, when are you coming home, home to Israel?' "

Advocacy organizations restructured

Finkelstein said UIAFC has been concerned by Israel's deteriorating public image, the growing anti-Israel agitation at universities and the rise of anti-Semitic incidents since the Palestinian intifadah began in September 2000. A UIAFC emergency cabinet, including Israel Asper, Gerald Schwartz, Larry Tannenbaum, Brent Belzberg, Julia Koschitzky, Stephen Cummings, Stephen Reitman and Ron Stern, was created to look into improving the community response to these issues. GPC International, a government and public relations firm headed by Hershell Ezrin, was hired to review the work of various organizations and consider possible areas of innovation.

Finkelstein said that while discussions are still in their early stages, it appears that organizations such as the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), Canadian Jewish Congress and Hillel of Greater Toronto (formerly Jewish Campus Services) will be expected to step up their advocacy roles.

"The big issues have been discussed, but not the details," Finkelstein said. "A framework is emerging. We're getting a vision of what to be but a lot of detail has to be looked at… A lot has to do with maximizing resources and how to spend more to do our jobs properly."

While discussions about who does what are still ongoing, outgoing CIC chair Joseph Wilder said "there is a role for the CIC in the future," but, he added, "I'm not sure what the parameters will be."

Along with the CIC board, Wilder is coming to the end of his three-year term, and was not consulted on possible changes to the organization. He believes the emergency cabinet has been talking about "re-jigging" various organizations.

"It's their call, not ours," he said.

While a nominations committee has been appointed to find a new board, "no one has been nominated yet," Wilder said. "I don't think it will have the same independence [as the current board]. The cabinet is assuming some degree of control.

"The cabinet indicated some time ago they want to involve themselves in how all community advocacy is delivered," he said.

Keith Landy, national president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), said the CJC hopes "to make some proposals [during the discussions] that the cabinet would accept that would permit the CJC to retain certain aspects of its governance. But these aspects we recognize should be more streamlined, more effective and efficient."

CJC is currently charged with community advocacy on domestic concerns such as anti-Semitism.

"For years, advocacy was the poor boy at the table [when community funding was allocated]. That was for good reason," Landy said, pointing to higher priority issues such as Soviet Jewry and supporting development projects in Israel.

But with the emergence of the second intifadah and the recent rise in anti-Semitism, recognition was finally given for greater emphasis on community advocacy, he said.

"I'm confident [CJC] will emerge as a stronger, more robust and ever-vigilant organization," he added.

Finkelstein speculated that to properly implement an enhanced PR offensive, the community may have to double the funds it allocates to advocacy agencies. That would lead to a boost in the number of missions to Israel, particularly those involving "opinion-makers," she said. In the past, only about $30,000 was allocated for these missions, she said, suggesting that as much as $500,000 would be set aside for future missions.

Finkelstein said by the time the UIAFC board meets on Sept. 30, she hopes formal agreements will have been reached with various community organizations across the country.

Earlier this summer, the CIC, the community's lobbying arm on Israel, commissioned a report into the Canadian public's knowledge of Israel and Canada's Mideast policy. The report, prepared by GPC Canada, found that many Canadians did not identify with Israel and were not aware of the shared values of Canadian and Israeli society. That attitude worked against a more favourable government policy to Israel, said Shimon Fogel, CIC's chief executive officer.

The CIC has taken steps in the last year to boost its advocacy efforts. In June 2002, it saw its funding boosted by 70 per cent and it began hiring personnel and co-ordinating larger and more frequent missions to Israel of parliamentarians and their key staff, Fogel said.

Kelowna Jews flee from fire

Nycole Yanow was one of the luckier evacuees. She and her husband, who live in Gallagher's Canyon, had several hours to prepare for the evacuation, relocate antiques to safer premises and consider what they wanted to pack.

"Kelowna is just an incredible town, and it's quite something to see how the community has worked together," she said. "Everyone becomes a volunteer, and we've been fed, accommodated, received vouchers and treated like royalty. It's made me love Kelowna more than ever."

Virtually all the evacuees were accommodated by friends in the community, Zidle said.

"We've been in touch with 99 per cent of the evacuees to find out if they need anything."

The OJCC would have provided financial assistance or accommodation, but none was necessary, he said.

Zidle added he has received calls of concern from representatives of the Canadian Jewish Congress and United Israel Appeal, also with offers of assistance.

Sam Larry, the congregation's spiritual leader, who organized a Friday night service in the centre's Beth Shalom sanctuary Aug. 29, said people in the community are much closer to each other than they were before the crisis.

"Hopefully the service will create some kind of closure for those that have been traumatized, because everyone that's been touched by the fire has been emotionally effected," he said.

During the fire's strongest days, residents in the area had to wear face masks or stay at home to protect themselves from the fumes.

"Those with breathing problems had great difficulty," said Zidle.

At the time this report was filed, the fire was 60 per cent contained, and many residents were being allowed home.

Despite the devastation, Yanow remained optimistic.

"When something is about to be taken away from you, you learn how much you love it," she said. "This place will bounce right back after the fatigue and anxiety subsides."

IDF will keep up heat until PA cracks down

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

The only thing that can possibly reduce the scope of Israel Defence Forces (IDF) attack operations in the West Bank and Gaza is serious, sustained action against the terror infrastructure by the Palestinian Authority (PA). If the PA doesn't make such a move, the IDF will continue its attacks on Hamas' and Islamic Jihad's leadership and terrorist networks.

Although Israel doesn't want to cause harm to the general Palestinian population, it will be impossible in IDF operations to avoid harming figures associated with Hamas' social-religious networks.

Israel might discuss a truce toward the end of the crackdown on the terrorist organizations.

It came to light recently that during negotiations between PA Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas, Hamas and Islamic Jihad, the Islamic organizations agreed to accept a truce only after Abbas promised not to harm their terror infrastructures. Israel refuses to accept such an arrangement.

Much now depends upon anti-terror actions taken by PA Security Minister Mohammed Dahlan and preventive security leaders in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The recent series of IDF attacks on Hamas leaders and operatives has reinforced a warning Israel has issued in the past: If Palestinians do not take firm steps against terror, Israel will do so itself using more drastic measures. The scope and intensity of Palestinian actions against the terror infrastructure will influence the nature of Israel's attacks against terrorists. Should the PA's activity against that infrastructure slacken, the IDF will intensify its anti-terror operations, possibly including attacks on the highest leadership stratum of Hamas.

The targets chosen by Israel in anti-terror operations have changed. Army forces strike against terror operatives and also against leaders from the militant Islamic organizations. This mixture of targets is meant to deter the terrorist organizations at all levels.

Therefore, it is not crucially important to Israel whether or not a missile fired from a helicopter is entirely accurate, or whether the target and his bodyguards escape. Ideally, the missile should hit these targets, but the overall purpose is to let Hamas know that the IDF is on its tail.

In addition, Israel would achieve a measure of success if Hamas operatives follow their organization's orders and walk only in narrow alleys disguised as women, or ride alone in cars and refrain from telephone calls.

The brunt of Abbas' talks have been with Hamas and Islamic Jihad, and not with the Fatah organization. Absurdly, Abbas has been unable to arrange a truce with the very organization he emerged from. PA President Yasser Arafat's meddling is largely to blame for this lack of an agreement with Fatah. Should Abbas and Dahlan insist that Arafat relinquish control of key parts of the PA security and intelligence infrastructure, it might lead the way for Abbas to bring Fatah under control.

U.S. wants Israel to make gestures to Palestinian Authority

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United States is pressing Israel to make "positive" gestures toward the Palestinians along with the military measures it is taking against terrorism.

In a message to Jerusalem from high-ranking administration officials, the Americans said that Israel need not desist from its policy of assassinating terror operatives, but it should also take steps that prove Israel's good intentions toward the Palestinians.

The administration is now focused on restoring the status quo that existed before the Jerusalem bus massacre last week and applying pressure on Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas to take steps against the terror organizations.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon met last week with Republican congressmen, to whom he praised U.S. road map inspector John Wolf and Ambassador to Israel Dan Kurtzer.

Sharon said that they have difficult jobs but deserve all the support they can get, because American monitoring of the road map is the only way it will be implemented.

The prime minister called for ongoing, uncompromising pressure on the Palestinian Authority, particularly in the economic sphere, to persuade it to act against terror.

"I am committed to the road map and want to proceed, but unless the Palestinians meet their obligations – a war on terror and the dismantling of the terror infrastructure – it is impossible to make progress," he said.

He also said that unless the Palestinians give up the right of return and recognize that the Jewish people have a right to a Jewish state, it will be impossible to achieve a solution.

The administration does not intend to send any senior officials to the region to calm the situation between Israel and the Palestinians.

Israeli tourism makes a comeback

By LOOLWA KHAZZOOM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV – A man lies on the ground in front of this no-frills guest house in Jerusalem as three young women rush toward him.

Reaching into large red bags, one pulls out a brace and snaps it on the young man's neck. Another pulls out a strap and ties his feet together, while the third pulls out bandages and wraps them around the man's arms.

The young Magen David Adom volunteers have made it to graduation day.

These graduates of the Israeli EMT course are among the thousands of Diaspora Jews coming to Israel this summer on youth and tour programs.

Despite nearly three years of intermittent terrorism, the number of tourists coming to Israel is again on the rise.

"The world situation has become less safe," said Michael Freeman, director in Israel of the Federation of Zionist Youth, which, along with Young Judaea, sponsored the EMT course. "Why not come to Israel? It's no more or less dangerous than anywhere else in the world these days – New York, Bali, Russia."

The EMT program has more participants this summer than ever, Freeman says. He attributes the increase to the new perception of Israel as comparatively safer, and to the program's reputation for safety and security.

"Parents have come to trust our name," he said.

The number of visitors in Zionist youth tourist groups to Israel has almost rebounded to figures from the year 2000, according to Zvi Levran, director of Jewish Experience of Israel.

But the number of other tourists is still down, however.

"Many organizations that appeal to unaffiliated or less affiliated populations – those not as committed to Israel – have not gotten back to their earlier numbers,"Levran said.

In general, however, the recent trend has been an increase in tourism to Israel.

"We're starting to see pent-up interest – Jews and Christians who have wanted to come to Israel but have not done so because of the situation," said Ari Marom, director of North American operations at Israel's Tourism Ministry.

Before the Aug. 19 Jerusalem bus bombing, the situation had become relatively stable, and anxiety about the Gulf War had passed, he said. "The Jerusalem bombing will begin to impact Israel tourism this fall," he predicted.

Meanwhile, countries around the world have sent a higher number of tourists to Israel this year than last.

"There is a nice percentage of increase," Marom said. "But you have to keep it in proportion."

In 2000, 3.2 million tourists visited the Jewish state. In 2002, there were fewer than 900,000.

This summer, Levran said, "there was a 100 per cent increase in Israel-experience programs."

That's both good news and bad news. The good news is the increase. The bad news is that the drop in tourism from 2000 to 2002 was so severe that even a 100 per cent increase this year hasn't brought tourism back to its pre-intifadah levels.

At its nadir since the start of the Palestinian intifadah in September 2000, the number of youths visiting Israel was down 92 per cent, meaning that only 800 youngsters came instead of 10,000.

That figure of 800 "has been more than doubled this year," Levran said, "but still it's only 2,000 in comparison to 10,000."

A number of additional factors have kept tourists away, including the global economic recession, anti-Israel boycotts in Europe and fear of travel after Sept. 11.

Travel from East Asia and Latin America is way down from 2000, partly because of changed airline routing, according to Marom.

"From South America, you have to change flights in Europe or the United States, and that in itself is a main reason for not coming," Marom said.

Numerous European airlines either reduced or eliminated flights to Israel, making it more difficult for potential tourists to get here.

European Christian groups that came during the past three years often made their presence known publicly as a way of showing solidarity with the Jewish state.

In fact, when violence heats up, Christian tourists from the United States often are slower to cancel their plans than Jewish tourists, but afterward the Christians "are much harder to get back," Marom noted.

Typically, Jews make up less than 50 per cent of tourists to Israel. In 2002, however, Jews well exceeded the 50 per cent mark.

Those who came to Israel this summer included tourists on organized tours, people visiting family in Israel and those coming to explore on their own. Jews made up the majority of the latter two groups.

Some tour groups, like those that work in conjunction with the Jewish Agency for Israel, are veritable security experts, Levran and Freeman said.

At 8 a.m. and 4 p.m. each day, leaders of Jewish Agency-affiliated programs are in touch with a "situation room" that is connected to police and army surveillance units.

Groups are advised on where it's safe and unsafe to travel on any given day. All groups are accompanied by a guard on outings.

With the use of global-positioning devices, parents can know where their children are at any given moment – something that's not possible "when kids are in their own city in the Unietd States," Levran pointed out.

Youths on the Magen David Adom volunteer program said they were not afraid, even as they prepared to accompany paramedics on calls that could take them into scenes of bloodshed.

"I feel that as a Jew, it's necessary to contribute to the country," said Adam Benjamin – who, with his friend Rafael Broch, arranged for 18 others youngsters from England to participate in the MDA program. "If that means facing things that Israelis have to face on a daily basis, why should I not?"

Non-Jewish friends back home, however, often have trouble understanding the reasons for visiting Israel these days.

"My non-Jewish friends in England think I'm mad coming here," Lisa Shama said.

Just days ago, she watched her instructors on television as they attended to victims of a suicide bombing.

Later that night she heard a firsthand account of what had happened. "I think what English people don't understand is that despite the bombs, normal life still carries on," Tal Heymann said.

Broch agreed. "You can either get on with your life just as Israelis do, or sink back into the Galut," he said, referring to the Diaspora. "That's not the kind of Jew I want to be."

Prisoner swap deal not reached with Hezbollah

If completed will not include information on Ron Arad

By URI ASH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli security officials said last week no prisoner swap deal had been forged with Hezbollah, but they were "cautiously optimistic" that a deal would materialize in the "near future." According to one report, the key to the impending deal has been Israel's willingness to abandon any connection between missing Israeli air force navigator Ron Arad and two Lebanese men it has detained, Sheikh Abd al Karim Obeid and Mustafa Dirani.

The Beirut daily A-Safir disclosed that German mediator Ernst Uhrlau had managed to resolve several points that had been in dispute between Israel and Hezbollah. The most divisive issue involved Israel's insistence on conditioning the release of Obeid and Dirani, who have been held for 14 and nine years respectively, on Hezbollah's disclosure of information about Arad. Israel, the A-Safir report suggests, has now abandoned this position.

According to a well-placed Israeli security official, "The deal has yet to be completed, but unlike in past instances, this time, we definitely have cause to be carefully optimistic."

The official acknowledged that if there is an exchange, it will not include information on Arad, whose plane was brought down in Lebanon in October 1986.

Details culled from Israeli security sources last week established that talks with Hezbollah had recently accelerated, with Uhrlau's mediation. The contacts began at Hezbollah's initiative, after the Shi'ite organization indicated it would be willing to make a deal involving the release of captured Israeli businessman Elhanan Tannenbaum.

Israel agreed to the talks, but only on condition that Hezbollah agree to the return of three Israel Defence Forces soldiers captured in October 2000 near the Lebanese border (the IDF has classified the three – St.-Sgt. Benny Avraham, St.-Sgt. Omar Suad and Sgt. Adi Avitan – as fallen soldiers whose places of burial are unknown).

The first stage in the talks was completed last Monday, when Israel returned the bodies of two Hezbollah guerrillas who were killed in clashes with the IDF in southern Lebanon. The men were buried in their native Lebanon village, Dibbine.

In exchange for the bodies, Hezbollah allowed Uhrlau to meet with Tannenbaum.

The German mediator reported to Israel that Tannenbaum was not in good health, so Israeli security officials decided to speed up talks for a prisoner release.

Tami Arad, wife of the missing navigator, criticized Maj.-Gen. (res.) Ilan Biran, who is co-ordinating Israel's efforts on behalf of its missing persons. Breaking a decade of silence, Tami Arad was interviewed on Israel Radio last week, angrily accusing Biran of treating her husband as though he is just "a page of history." She said the release of Obeid and Dirani at this stage, in the absence of disclosure about her husband's fate, would constitute Israel's abandonment of efforts to save him.

International Red Cross delegate Francois Bellon met with the family of MIA Benny Avraham last Wednesday for more than an hour at their Petach Tikvah home. Bellon stressed that he was not party to the negotiations, which were conducted by a German envoy.

"Bellon is preparing the ground in case the negotiations end favourably. He told us it should take days or weeks, not months," Haim Avraham, Benny's father, said afterward.

Meanwhile the London-based Arabic-language newspaper Al-Hayat reported that the deal being brokered would not include Arad.

22% of Israeli families suffer from poor nutrition

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – About 22 per cent of Israeli families are too poor to regularly buy food or maintain a balanced diet essential to body function and childhood development, according to a study released earlier this year by the American Jewish Distribution Committee-Brookdale Institute and the Israeli Health Ministry.

Some 400,000 families suffer from what researchers call "nutritional insecurity" caused by economic distress. The findings are based on a survey of 1,400 families and is the first of its kind in Israel.

Researchers defined nutritional insecurity as eating smaller portions, skipping meals, and in extreme cases, not eating for a whole day. Nutritional insecurity is furthered by eating monotonous food that is high in carbohydrates and lacking in meat, dairy products, vegetables and fruit.

Situation has deteriorated in past two years

Fourteen per cent of families are deemed moderately insecure and eight per cent suffer from severe insecurity. A family's situation is considered moderate when the parents deprive themselves of food to ensure the children get what they need. In families whose situation is severe, neither the children nor the parents have enough food.

Some 80 per cent of the nutritionally insecure families reported a deterioration in their situation in the past two years due to the economic troubles.

About 60 per cent of the nutritionally insecure are Jewish families, 20 per cent are Arab families and 20 per cent are new immigrant families.

In related findings, one in five conscripts to the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) comes from a family living beneath the poverty line, said IDF Deputy Chief of Staff Gabi Ashkenazi, citing data from the most recent draft.

Ashkenazi said steps to improve the situation include providing the soldiers with weekly packages containing essential items.

The army is also giving military store coupons to IDF commanders, which they can distribute to needy soldiers.

While 90 per cent of the conscripts expressed a desire to serve in fighting units, Ashkenazi said there is no doubt that poverty reduces a soldier's motivation.

Israel grapples with West Bank security fence

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Israel's resolve to build a security fence through the West Bank and around Jerusalem has been bolstered by the bloody events of recent weeks.

As a result of the Aug. 19 suicide bombing in Jerusalem, Israel's assassination of Hamas leader Ismail Abu Shanab in the Gaza Strip and Hamas' renunciation of the ceasefire, the hudna, Israel is likely to complete the state-of-the-art barrier sooner rather than later.

The fence, which is designed to keep terrorists out of Israel, is a twisting mix of barbed-wire fencing, concrete walls, electronic sensors and guard towers. It meanders along the old Green Line but also juts into the West Bank.

The first phase, a 147 kilometre stretch in the northern West Bank, was completed at the end of July, a month into the shaky truce. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz are currently discussing the second phase, construction of which has yet to start.

The fence, which is likely to cost more than $1 billion (US) when finished, has triggered a welter of controversy and acrimony.

Instead of strictly following the boundary of the Green Line, the former border between Israel and the territories, it sometimes cuts deeply into the West Bank.

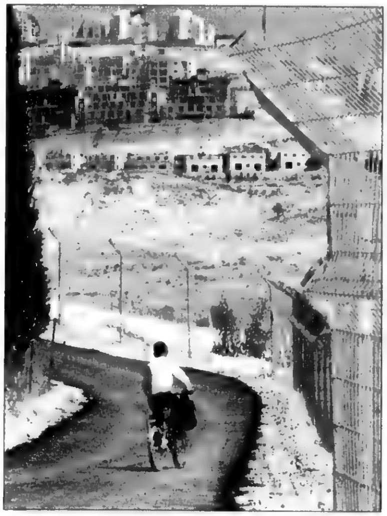
These intrusions, which are designed to place Jewish settlements on the Israeli side of the fence, affect the Palestinians directly.

According to a joint report released by the European Union, the United States, the United Nations, the World Bank and Norway, the bulk of the land used for the first portion of the fence was confiscated from Palestinians.

In addition, its path is such that thousands of Palestinian villagers have been cut off from arable lands, schools and social services, while the town of Qalqilya has been isolated from the West Bank.

The Palestinians, who refer to the fence as an "apartheid wall" and a new "Berlin wall," claim that Israel is unilaterally creating facts on the ground and thus a new permanent border. The Israeli government denies this accusation, saying that the fence is a temporary measure, and will not be needed if Israel and the Palestinian Authority sign a peace treaty.

Nevertheless, the planned route of the fence troubles the United States, Israel's chief ally.



A Palestinian boy rides his bicycle next to a security fence constructed by the Israeli army to separate Bethlehem from Jerusalem. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Washington, which has no objection to the fence in principle, is particularly concerned that one section will extend as far east as Ariel, the second largest Jewish settlement in the West Bank.

At his last meeting in Washington with Sharon, President George W. Bush described the routing as "a problem," saying that the fence will break the territorial contiguity of a future Palestinian state.

Hammering home the point, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said that the fence " is developing in a way that will make it very difficult to reach the next stage of the road map." He was referring, of course, to the internationally sponsored Mideast peace plan, which envisages a two-state solution by 2005.

Edgar Bronfman, the president of the World Jewish Congress, has joined the debate. In a letter to Bush on the eve of Sharon's recent visit, Bronfman wrote that the route of the fence is problematic.

Given Washington's reservations over its routing, Israel has agreed not to continue building the fence until the two sides reach an agreement.

Bowing to a U.S. request, Sharon has asked officials to present him with a revised route that protrudes less into Palestinian areas. Mofaz, however, appears to be adhering to the position that the fence should be erected east of settlements such as Ariel and Immanuel.

The concept of a fence to physically separate Israel from the West Bank has been brewing since the outbreak of Palestinian suicide bombings in 1994, the year Israel built a barrier to enclose the Gaza Strip. No suicide bomber has ever penetrated it.

The idea of building a fence through the West Bank gained currency after the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising in the autumn of 2000. Initially, Jewish settlers in the territories opposed a fence, thinking it would undermine their claim to the West Bank. But in a switch of tactics, they convinced Sharon to turn the fence to their advantage by rerouting it.

Now it is left to Sharon to choose a final route.

Researchers working on improved Alzheimer's drug

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The Israeli professor who invented Exelon, one of the two major drugs prescribed for the symptoms of Alzheimer's disease, is now collaborating with McGill University to research an improved medication.

Marta Weinstock-Rosin, a Hebrew University of Jerusalem pharmacology professor, has been on sabbatical at McGill working with noted neuroscientist Dr. Claudio Cuello on the new drug which has the preliminary name of TV-3326.

Weinstock-Rosin said TV-3326 has an antioxidant effect, which should slow down the development of Alzheimer's at an early stage. Free radical damage is associated with the neuronal loss that signals a person is predisposed to developing the disease.

"This drug clearly has a protective effect against oxidation in animals," said Weinstock-Rosin, who cautioned that TV-3326 may be years away from commercial production. She is careful not to raise the expectations of desperate patients and their families. Teva Pharmaceuticals, Israel's leading drug company, has matched a $100,000 grant from the Israeli government to fund research on the new drug.

> Ideally, the new drug will allow intervention at an early enough stage to prevent the onset of dementia

The safety of TV-3326 is now being tested on healthy individuals in the first of three phases of clinical trials.

Ideally, the new drug will allow intervention at an early enough stage to prevent the onset of dementia. Magentic resonance imaging can detect the subtle changes in the brain that indicate susceptibility. TV-3326 will act more slowly than Exelon, taking two hours to kick in and thereby reducing the side-effects of nausea and vomiting some suffer with Exelon, Weinstock-Rosin said.

TV-3326 also has the advantage of being an antidepressant. Not only are those with Alzheimer's prone to depression, but the depressed elderly have a fairly high likelihood of developing cognitive impairments after a few years, she said. It may also be beneficial in the treatment of Parkinson's disease, which is sometimes present with Alzheimer's in the same individual, even though the neurons affected are in different parts of the brain.

Weinstock-Rosin and Cuello will continue their work together after she returns to Israel this month. She will send the brains of mice and rats to Montreal, so that Cuello's lab can analyze the nerve connections.

These rodents have been genetically altered to induce some of the pathology of Alzheimer's. The animals do not get the disease naturally.

Exelon, which is manufactured by the Swiss company Novartis, was approved for use in Europe in 1998, and in Canada and the United States in 2000. Worldwide sales have reached the billions of dollars, but this has not made Weinstock-Rosin rich; the royalties are paid to Hebrew University.

Both Exelon and its main competitor, Aricept, can improve the memory of people with mild to moderate Alzheimer's, and slow down progression of the disease. "Some patients respond to both drugs, some respond to neither. Some do not respond to Aricept but do to Exelon. The reverse, however, has never been shown," Weinstock-Rosin said.

"According to the published data, Exelon also has a positive effect on behaviour aberration, such as paranoia and agitation."

Chemically, Exelon is rivastigmine, an inhibitor of cholinesterase, an enzyme that breaks down the neurotransmitter acetylcholine, which has a role in memory and cognition. People with Alzheimer's have dramatically low levels of acetylcholine.

Weinstock-Rosin, who immigrated to Israel from Britain in 1969, has been a professor at Hebrew University since 1977. Since 1987, she has held the Leon and Minna Deutsch Chair of Psychopharmacology in Hebrew University's faculty of medicine, endowed by Montrealers. Minna Deutsch, 92, is a psychiatrist who worked at the Douglas Hospital for many years.

Despite the advances, Weinstock-Rosin said many doctors remain convinced that little can be done to alleviate Alzheimer's and therefore "don't bother" to get their patients tested for brain changes, let alone prescribe medication.

"We have had fights about this in Israel. It took two years of arguing to have Exelon and Aricept covered by the national health program, and [coverage] was only given initially when the person could not take care of himself, and that is too late."

It took a great deal of work, including trials with 3,000 patients, to prove to government authorities that the drugs must be prescribed as early as possible to do any good, she said.

What they were doing was false economy, she points out. Medicating Alzheimer's patients can delay by at least a year to 18 months the need for institutionalization, which costs the public purse far more.

Weinstock-Rosin, who has been in pharmacological research for 45 years, said watching her mother-in-law disintegrate from the Alzheimer's was one of the influences on her work. (Her husband Dr. Arnold Rosin, former chief of geriatrics at the Shaare Zedek Medical Centre, now runs a network of day centres for Alzheimer's sufferers living at home in Jerusalem, call Melabev.)

While the TV-3326 may have a protective effect, Weinstock-Rosin says it is impossible to invent a drug that would reverse Alzheimer's because once cells have died, they cannot be regenerated.

HAIR: Pump up the volume with Volumactive Treatment Gel from Kerastase Resistance Line. It's a light leave-in gel – perfect for fine hair. It actually protects your hair from the blowdryer.

Longer hair will be the trend this season, says Cristina Marra, a stylist at Terry Ritcey Salon (122 Yorkville Ave., 416-927-0624). She also informs us that bold, chunky highlights are still popular. The difference this fall will be that they are hidden beneath the hair, which helps to add depth and texture, yet can be exposed for fun and drama.

Robyn Alex, also from the Ritcey Salon, agrees long hair is the way to go. She is styling more hair past the shoulder with wispy, flicky layering from the bangs to the back of the head. Rich shiny browns and auburns are taking front stage over the blondes. Even natural blondes are opting for creamier shades, Alex says.

Both stylists are making extensive use of Nurti- Huille and Anti Frizz from Kerastase's Oleo-Relax line. Both these products protect and give hair huge shine. One more mention for Robyn – she shapes the best eyebrows in town!

Go for fit and like what you wear

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

Professional image consultant Brenda Kinsel specializes in showing women how to build fashionable wardrobes that flatter their figures and exude confidence. Among her clients are physicians, lawyers, entrepreneurs, writers, and real estate agents of varied ages.

As owner of Inside Out, a style and wardrobe consulting company in California, Kinsel has been advising clients and contributing articles to major publications since 1985.

A popular guest on Oprah Winfrey and Fox News, Kinsel's chatty approach commands attention. Initially, Kinsel earned a degree in education and the teaching component shines through in her repartee. A hands-on entrepreneur, she makes a point of marching into dressing rooms and instructing clients how to choose well-fitting garments. Consequently, they learn how to build fashionable wardrobes that look chic and feel great.

Now, Kinsel puts readers through the paces in her latest book. Aptly titled In the Dressing Room with Brenda, the softcover text is distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada. It is enhanced with illustrations by graphic designer Jenny McFee Phillips. Readers will benefit from Kinsel's extensive research and 20 years of hands-on experience.

Unlike her previous monograph, 40 Over 40: 40 Things Every Woman Over 40 Needs to Know About Getting Dressed, Kinsel's current book is directed to a heterogeneous target market. She addresses young mothers caring for infants as well as senior executives. Similarly, she offers pointers for sizes ranging from zero petite to woman's 3x.

The author says clothes mark the journey of our lives, reflect important events, and make unimportant ones memorable. The 23 chapters are laced with humorous quips. Kinsel advises women to clean their closets and get rid of clothes that don't fit, are out of date, and are unappealing.

She lists "Bren's Rules for Dressing". The following is a sampling. Love what you wear and wear what you love. Don't save anything for special occasions. Start each day with well-fitting underwear. Keep your fashion moving because not moving makes you look freeze-framed in a particular year. For example, big football shoulder pads from the 1980s and the oversized layer look from the early 1990s make a woman look dated.

A popular guest on Oprah Winfrey and Fox News

Kinsel clues-in women on body proportions and what apparel suits each shape. Go for fit, not size. The characteristics of a good fit are garments that follow the shape of the body with no indications of stress or wrinkling. The shoulder seam should sit on top of the shoulder. The curves at the neckline, armholes, hips and waistline should follow the natural contours of the body without binding or gaping. The length of the sleeves and hem should be smooth and even. The garment should fall at the most flattering point on the figure. Kinsel praises "the new frontier in fabrics" lauding Lycra for leeway in fit.

"A wardrobe is a fine-tuned machine," says Kinsel. "Like your car, it needs check-ups and adjustments to keep purring."

A model with chutzpah

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

What sets Shani Feldman apart from other models is her Jewish chutzpah.

"You have to be assertive and organized" to be a model, the 22-year-old Torontonian says. "Don't be shy about asking for water at a shoot or saying, 'You wanna dye my hair blue? Forget it!'"

Shani Feldman's acquaintances are often stumped by her ethnicity. The model's background is Polish-Antiguan.

What also sets Feldman apart from the other models at "cattle calls" ("Picture 1,000 women vying for one job," she explains) is her Polish-Antiguan background. Acquaintances are stumped by her ethnicity: some have guessed she is from Brazil, others have guessed Jamaica.

A glance into Feldman's room exposes the fashion freak. Her walls are plastered with pictures of male and female models, and beautiful celebrities from Brandy to Will Smith. Feldman also cuts out photos that entice the shopaholic in her. Pointing at one picture, she gushes, "That blue wedding dress, I'll be wearing that soon."

To her delight, Feldman is converting her passion for clothes into runway success. In 2002, Feldman made $30,000 from her shows, in which she modelled for such companies as Urban Outfitters and Balenciaga (when she was in Paris). She has travelled to Milan, Spain and New York, and has worked with Hugo Boss, Holt Renfrew, Nike, Franco Mirabelli and Elle Canada.

It has been a humbling journey for the girl "everyone used to call skinny," Feldman says.

Things got off to a shaky start when she began working at Elite Model Management at 16. She developed an infection from make-up that stuck to her eyes. She was told her hips were half an inch too big. But Feldman continued with the photo shoots and began nabbing showcases soon after her first meeting with Elite. She was told she had a "look," that vague term saved for the exotically beautiful.

Feldman is quick to shatter Hollywood-fed myths about models.

"We all don't do cocaine and starve ourselves… In fact, some model friends and I gorge on McDonald's when we're really hungry, like any other person."

Feldman is represented by B & M Models, a company that "is excited when you get a job, and they're not just looking blah," she says.

Modelling work requires patience and dedication, she says, so it's satisfying when someone appreciates the hours and the hard work.

While she has paraded clothing lines for fashion aficionados and posed in catalogues for companies such as Sears, Feldman doesn't see modelling as a full-time career path. But she's happy to be waist-deep in eyeliner and flashbulbs for now.

"Travelling in Paris and Spain, everything paid for… Who wouldn't love that?" she says. "But I want to go back to school, maybe take fashion or business."

For models like Feldman, who view the gigs as part thrill and part overkill, the double-dose of fun and income override such obstacles as pushy stylists, competitive attitudes and superficial values. But it always comes down to those boxes of magazines, those models she admires.

"I love fashion and I've always loved fashion magazines," Feldman says. "Usually, I love this job."

Campus Fashion

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

As the long summer days wind down, many students are packing up and moving out for the first time. Whether just beginning a vocational or technical program, taking a bachelor's degree or specializing at a higher level, for many, this is their first foray away from home to the on-campus experience. Preparations are lengthy and require much research to find appropriate housing and make final moving arrangements.

Daniel Salem, 19, a former Dawson College Student in Montreal, will be attending Ryerson University in Toronto, where he will major in Radio and Television Arts. This will be his first move away from home.

Salem has opted to live in student residence. His must-have personal items include his golf clubs and hockey equipment.

"I have to find out about extra storage for my golf clubs and hockey equipment because I want to have them available to me in Toronto," he says. He will also pack his tennis racket for the occasional game.

Salem's clothing requirements are much less stringent. "I am easygoing about what I wear," he says. "I grab whatever is in my closet."

A confirmed casual dresser, he looks to comfort first for campus wear. "Most days I'll just throw on a pair of sweatpants," stresses Salem. "If I want to create a better first impression, I'll grab a pair of jeans and a cotton sweater."

He prefers the laid-back style of Old Navy, Abercrombie and Nike. He shops on his own and accepts hand-me-downs from his cousin. "I look for what I like and what is comfortable," he says. He will also pack his two black suits with dress shirts and ties, "just in case."

"I don't want to be stuck not having an item of clothing if I'm invited to a bar mitzvah or wedding," says Salem, "I want to be safe." Not one to read fashion magazines, Salem says he likes to start his own trends.

Erica Bishen, 20, is set to begin her second year in general arts studies at the University of British Columbia (UBC) and will be returning to the dorms.

Packing up after spending the summer on the waterfront at the Samuel Bronfman Y Country Camp in the Laurentians and heading back to school is always a challenge for Bishen. She wants to take everything possible with her and is faced with airline weight restrictions.

"Luckily, my parents travelled with me [to UBC] last year, so they were able to take a lot of my things in their luggage," she says.

Bishen says her style is casual chic. Her luggage is full of comfortable, good-quality clothing, including a full range of pajama pants, sweats, T-shirts and sweatshirts. A confessed "bad shopper," she picks up things when she needs them. "I am definitely not a recreational shopper," she says.

She doesn't look for brands, although she admits that often quality and comfort come with a brand name. Bishen's fashion passion is accessorizing. "I like earrings and necklaces. My preferred outfit is a pair of sweatpants, a hoody and a 'statement necklace.'"

Bishen has followed this year's fashion trend of large rhinestone necklaces and seashell-inspired pieces. She always wears multiple earrings, combining diamond studs and small hoops in several piercings. She prefers one good quality watch and sports a Swiss Army model.

Bishen will pack her bathing suit to keep up her swimming skills while away. Her only regret is that she has no room for her piano.

French Dressing Jeanswear – a brand for women over 35.

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

Jeans, a favourite mode of dress for farm workers and cowboys, have long been in the fashion forefront with avant-garde styling adopted by movie stars, the rich and famous, teenagers and older folk. Montreal designer Donald Johannesson has taken this fashion craze to new heights with petite and regular size styles.

Since 1985, he has been designing the French Dressing Jeanswear line – a brand name that makes women over the age of 35 look at jeans in a different way. An award-winner with more than 30 years in the fashion industry, Johannesson says he uses "lines, curves and angles to bring you comfortable jeanswear and a flattering fit."

His fall/winter collection is new and bold. Inspired by styles from the four corners of the world, it includes fashions in a rainbow of 12 colours, from frosted blues to peppery reds, olive greens and lush purples. The stretch fabrics include textured solids and stripes, and the styles can be mixed and matched to suit your mood or the occasion.

A stretch Houndstooth blazer with matching skirt takes you to the office and beyond. The twill western jacket in brick, camel or black, and the stretch Houndstooth L-pocket flares topped with a poplin menswear-style shirt, are perfect for running around doing weekend shopping and visiting friends. And the dark indigo crosshatch denim frock coat over matching straight-leg pants is ideal for an afternoon date.

In sizes 2 to 20, with relaxed, easy and natural fits in stretchy materials that are mostly 97 per cent cotton and three per cent spandex, French Dressing Jeanswear flatters every figure. The styling is classic and the choice of fabrics lets you feel comfortable and ready for any occasion.

French Dressing Jeanswear president Len Miller's business philosophy is to stay focused.

French Dressing Jeanswear is a division of Keystone Industries 1970 Ltd., which was started by the late David Mindlin in 1908. In 1967, Mindlin's nephew Len Miller joined the firm and over the ensuing years, there have been several partners working with him. Three years ago, Miller was able to buy out his partners with the help of the Fonds de Solidarité FTQ and Venture Capital Fund, and he has not looked back since.

"Our volume has nearly doubled over the last three years, and our major thrust is French Dressing Jeanswear with a line of jeans, vests, shorts, skirts, capris, shirts and now knit tops, all in washable cotton-based stretch fabrics," says Miller who is president of the company of 325 employees with facilities in Thetford Mines and in Ville St. Laurent.

In addition to the French Dressing Jeanswear line, Keystone Industries also manufactures jeans under private labels for North American companies.

About six years ago, members of the French Dressing Jeanswear division became interested in supporting breast cancer research. In 1997, Miller opened a corporate Breast Cancer Awareness and Research Fund to which the company has been contributing 50 cents for every pair of French Dressing Jeanswear jeans sold. To date, more than $1 million has been donated to Canadian and American charities working to combat the disease.

"We're dedicated to helping not only the research into finding a cure for breast cancer, but also to raising awareness," says Miller, and during the month of October, French Dressing Jeanswear and hundreds of supportive retailers across Canada and the United States will ask women to "Try the Fit – Help the Cause."

During breast cancer awareness month, the company will contribute an additional $1 to its fund for every woman who tries on a pair of these jeans. As well, French Dressing Jeanswear is a second level sponsor for the CURE Foundation.

French Dressing Jeanswear is available in independent ladieswear boutiques and small independent regional chain stores across Canada and the United States. To view the fall line, visit the Web site at www.frenchdressingjeans.com.

Starting university with style

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

This fall brings about a much-anticipated change for me and thousands of other Canadians. Yes, it's finally time for university. It's finally time to break away from regular programming and embark on a journey all our own.

Whether you're petrified or excited, I guarantee it'll be a wild ride, full of interesting people and new surroundings.

But amidst this newfound chaos, one question arises. With all the confusion in the air, where does one find time for style? The answer: there must always be a time for style.

At this fragile time in a young individual's blossoming career, style can be a defining factor in what makes or breaks a person. Now is the time to re-invent yourself and really go for broke, although hopefully not literally.

Don't hesitate to follow your heart's desire. How many times have you seen a fabulous shirt or accessory, but have been too shy to buy it for fear of not fitting in with the rest of your cookie-cutter peers?

Well now is the time to overcome that fear. Go for it! Attempt to develop your own sense of style. It's easier than you think. Once you change that reserved attitude about clothing, creativity will come easily to you.

There are so many wonderful trends out there this fall. Whether it be mod or the revamped tomboy, you can find a niche that is uniquely your own.

This fall, don't get caught in the sea of polo shirts and white tanks. Rather, make yourself a self-proclaimed guru of style. But most of all, don't forget a laid-back attitude. If you have fun with your clothes, chances are you'll have an awesome time wearing them.

The only free-standing women's Boss store in North America

By MATTHEW WISE
Special to The CJN

Nestled within the majestic cobblestone corridors of historic Old York Lane in trendy Yorkville is Toronto's newest slice of Italian couture.

Open since last fall, the new Hugo Boss store at 138 Cumberland St. is the only free-standing women's Boss store in North America.

The sales staff is friendly and stylish, with an approachableness and product knowledge that make for an enjoyable browsing experience.

It goes without saying that the clothes are stunning, but the accessories are even more so. Watches, purses and the most gorgeous eyewear add a whole new dimension to the already impressive lineup, and are a perfect complement to the clothing collection.

The watches range from sharp silver to soft pastels.

The eyewear tends to be streamlined and frameless, and is as comfortable as it is funky.

This season, the jackets are mostly short, cut narrow and lean, with colours and patterns ranging from alluring cigar brown to deep, mineral green. The suit jackets are mostly fitted and the skirts are knee-length with a traditional A-line.

Details take a cue from corsets and lingerie: hook and eye closures on jackets, heavy darting and stitching on blouses and dresses that bring emphasis to fit. Evening options include tulle dresses with brown leather paillettes and stone -washed crepe dresses with handkerchief hems.

Not only are the clothes beautiful, they're comfortable and long-lasting, which are qualities not always found in high-end fashions.

Fifty years of instant memories for Auto-Photo Canada

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN

When Clark Kent needed a place to change into his Superman outfit in the blockbuster feature film, he used a photo booth supplied by Auto-Photo Canada Ltd. Familiar to most of us as a quick stop for photos, Auto-Photo Canada is celebrating its 50th anniversary as a Canadian leader in the instant photo business.

In 1950, Samuel Grostern brought the new concept of instant photo booths from New York City to Canada. His company has remained in the hands of his family, with Sam's son George, 66, and grandson Jeff, 40, at the helm today.

"I was 16 when my father started the business and I began working in the shop handling shipping and repairs," says George Grosten. "You could say I grew up in the business."

A chartered accountant by profession, George worked independently for many years and bought the company from his father in 1976.

Sam remained active in the company until his death last year at the age of 94. He lived long enough to enjoy his grandson Jeff's entry into the business. Also a chartered accountant, Jeff worked for many years as the comptroller for a necktie manufacturing company, joining his father and grandfather 10 years ago.

The Grosterns have grown Auto-Photo Canada into the primary operator of automatic photo booths across Canada, with over 500 units located in most major malls.

"We have photo booths from Victoria, Vancouver Island right acrosss the country to Newfoundland," says Jeff.

With modest beginnings in the old Woolworth store chain, Auto-Photo Canada instant photo booths can now be found at the premier retail spots throughout the country including, to name just a few, the Pepsi Forum and Fairview Pointe Claire in Montreal, Yorkdale Mall and the Eaton Centre in Toronto, the West Edmonton Mall to the Pacific Centre in Vancouver.

Most malls house one to four machines strategically placed in high-traffic areas such as entrances and exits and near the food courts. The enormous West Edmonton Mall contains 15 photo booths. Both the Montreal Metro and the Toronto Transit Commission in Toronto have several machines located throughout their transit network. Over the last several years, Auto-Photo Canada has also pioneered instant sketch and portrait studio machines, as well as "hair illusion units" that allow hair salon customers to test various colours and styles when making a change.

Both the technology and accessibility of automatic photo booths have changed dramatically in the last 50 years. As kids, we glammed it up with friends at the mall and waited for what seemed an endless amount of time for a strip of four small black and white photos to emerge. Today's machines provide almost instant colour photos or black and white sketched portraits. Traditional black and white photos are also still available for passport- quality pictures.

"We provide an instant high- quality photo," says Jeff Grostern. "It is a true developed photo that will not fade and that will endure forever."

Auto-Photo Canada has carved out a niche for itself as the designer photo booth supplier for Canada. Each of its booths is customized to match the décor of the mall.

"We sit down with each mall manager to design the specific booth for the mall in question," Jeff says. "When the mall redecorates, we redo the photo both."

Auto-Photo Canada's head office is located in the Royalmount industrial park in Montreal's west end. The company's team is rounded out by a full-support staff of 20, including technicians and carpenters. Its 12,000-square-foot warehouse has a dizzying array of photo booths, including some dating back to the company's inception in the 1950s.

A capital intensive business, each booth costs approximately $20,000. The units are custom built and then rented with a built-in service contract. Preferably installed in high-traffic areas, there is constant follow-up and the booths are continuously visited by the service team to ensure breakdowns are minimized.

"Our technicians are on the road six days a week, seven if necessary," says George Grostern. "Jeff and I also make service calls when needed, we still run when necessary."

While many of their roles overlap, Jeff specializes in marketing and sales and oversees much of production. George is quick to point out that when Jeff came on board, he immediately computerized the accounting system.

"While we both do everything, I appreciate Jeff's younger contacts and perspective," says George, who works in marketing research. Always looking for new venues in which to place the Auto-Photo units, he attends many trade shows and walks around malls scouting potential venues.

"I love malls and I am a great mall-walker," says George. "I am always looking for new locations and looking to improve upon the placement of existing machines."

Auto-Photo Canada is also always looking for new markets. It has recently expanded to include supplying photo booths for bar mitzvahs, weddings and other special events. And Superman isn't the only famous project it has worked on.

"We are often called by movie production companies to supply our booths for feature films," says Jeff. "Most recently, one of our booths was featured in a Backstreet Boys music video."

For another recent project, the company teamed up with a local cinema operator to create a custom-designed photo booth that resembled a large box of popcorn.

"Tradtionally within our industry, there is one major company in each country," says Jeff. "We are now ready to forge ahead into the American marketplace."

The Grosterns are confident in their expansion goals.

"Everybody uses our machines because our quality is unsurpassed," says Jeff. "While every photographer is our competitor, the ease of use and quality of our finished photos make us the common man's Karsh of photography."

Toronto International Film Festival presents three Israeli movies

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Three Israeli movies and one film set in Israel are scheduled to be screened at this year's Toronto International Film Festival.

Rosenstrasse is about a unique incident in Nazi Germany.

The festival, which opens on Sept. 4, is presenting Nir Bergman's Broken Wings, Amos Gitai's Alila and Ra'anan Alexandrowicz's James' Journey to Jerusalem.

In addition, Outcry, an exploration of Ethiopian Jews in Israel, will be shown.

The festival is also screening Margarethe Von Trotta's German-language film, Rosenstrasse, which focuses on a little-known incident in Berlin in 1943 in which a group of Jewish forced labourers were saved by their Christian wives.

Broken Wings was a big winner at Israel's 2002 Academy Awards.

Broken Wings, which won nine prizes at Israel's 2002 Academy Awards, revolves around a widow and her four children still mourning the death of their husband and father.

An intimate drama about a Haifa family dealing with an abrupt loss, Broken Wings concentrates on private human experiences rather than the political turmoil usually associated with contemporary Israel.

Featuring a cast of mostly unknown actors, Broken Wings marks Bergman's feature debut as a director.

In Alila, Gitai – the director of Kippur and Kedma – looks at Israeli society through the mundane lives of several residents of a small apartment complex.

At the centre of the film is Ezra, an unhappy contractor working at the complex. Ezra's wife treats him with contempt and his son, due to be inducted into the army, barely acknowledges him.

Rosenstrasse, named after an obscure street in eastern Berlin, tells the story of three women whose identities are linked to a unique event in the annals of Nazi Germany.

After purging Berlin of virtually all its Jewish residents, the Nazis decided to round up Jewish workers who had been spared by virtue of their marriage to gentiles.

Their wives, in an unprecedented move, protested. The Nazis relented.

In Rosenstrasse, Von Trotta recaps this event in a film that bridges family histories and stories of love.

James, the son of an African preacher, is at the centre of James' Journey to Jerusalem.

On behalf of a congregation of devout Christians back home, James visits Israel, imagining that it must be a Garden of Eden. But when he arrives in Israel, James' illusions are shattered. He is thrown into prison as an illegal immigrant. A cynical labour contractor bails him out, and James learns about life in Israel.

A film that bridges family histories and stories of love

Destau Damtou's Outcry, set in 2010, delves into the heart of the Jewish Ethiopian community in Israel.

Damtou's film is billed as a a meditation on race, power and inequality.

Through black and white abstractions and a cacophony of sounds, Phil Solomon's Psalm 111: Night of the Meek evokes the historical moments leading up to the Holocaust.

In François Dupeyron's French film, Monsieur Ibrahim, which takes place in Paris in the early 1960s, the Egyptian actor Omar Sharif plays a Muslim grocer who becomes a father figure to a Jewish boy.

And in another French film, Bon Voyage, director Jean-Paul Rappenau recreates the Nazi occupation of France. It stars Isabelle Adjani and Gérard Depardieu.

Siddiq Barmak's Osama, the first film shot in Afghanistan since the ouster of the Islamic fundamentalist Taliban regime in 2001, is a drama that turns on a 12-year-old girl who must disguise herself as a boy in order to find a job in a repressive, puritanical society.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Two recent graduates of York University's film and video program have pulled off an amazing coup.

Their movie has been accepted by the Toronto International Film Festival, which runs from Sept. 4-13.

Ezra Krybus, 23, and Matthew Miller, 22, both of Toronto, recently learned that their 13-minute short, The School, was selected for the festival's Perspective Canada's program.

Screening dates are Tuesday, Sept. 9 at 9:30 p.m. and Friday, Sept. 12 at 8:45 a.m. at the Royal Ontario Museum.

Based on a short story by Donald Barthelme, The School, a dark comedic fable about the nature of death, will also be shown at the Los Angeles International Short Film Festival, the Atlantic Film Festival and the Manhattan Short Film Festival.

"I suppose we were a little surprised that the film has taken off so quickly," said Krybus. "When you're submerged in the filmmaking process, the end seems so far away. Festivals are the last thing on your mind."

The pair wrote and directed the movie as a fourth-year school project. Having previously worked together on a short drama called Sundown, they felt they needed to do something "more daring, something with humour, something with an edge."

They completed a script, assembled a crew and started filming last October. Since The School was funded entirely by students, their budget was extremely tight: $9,000.

Asked when he was first attracted to cinema, Krybus replied, "I dreamed of being an actor when I was young. I guess I didn't even realize that there were people working behind the camera."

Krybus, who attended Thornhill Secoindary and Vaughan Secondary, added: "I grew up on movies, though I really came close to studying theatre at university. At the last minute, I figured that if I went to film school I would learn how movies are made. At least I would learn a craft. I guess I just got the bug, because now there's nothing else I'd rather be doing."

Miller was drawn to the stage, having been involved in a high school theatre group after attending Thornlea Secondary School.

But, Miller said, "as I grew older and I began watching the classic American films of the 1970s, I realized I had to make movies. I became obsessed with film, watching a movie every day for my last few years of high school."

Famous directors have influenced both him and Krybus.

"Over the last few years, I've become very fond of the work of the late Polish filmmaker Krzysztof Kieslowski [Red, White, Blue]," said Krybus. "He had a way of structuring his films around a single idea and thus made them feel fully whole and alive."

Miller, who has been influenced by The Simpsons, Woody Allen and Stanley Kubrick, credits his parents, Sol and Myra, with having given him the confidence and courage to pursue a career in a difficult field.

Miller said he wants to remain a filmmaker in Canada, but will consider moving to Europe or the United States if he cannot achieve his goals here.

Krybus agreed, claiming he is not driven by the fame and fortune of Hollywood.

"I'd love to work in Canada, this is my home, but the problem is that there are not many people making films here. I want people to see my work, and if that means I have to move, then that's a sacrifice I'd be willing to make. Hopefully, that won't be the case."

Speaking for himself and Miller, Krybus said he has no idea whether The School will affect their respective careers.

"Some filmmakers keep pushing on and others fade into obscurity pretty quickly. It's a tough business, and many things have to fall into place for you to be successful. We just want to make movies. You make one so you can make the next one – that's how it works."

Krybus and Miller are already looking ahead.

They have written a script in collaboration with Sascha Drews for The Drizzle, a dark fable now in pre-production in Germany.

The pair is also finishing a screenplay called The Portage. "It's a cautionary tale about young children lost out in the wilderness," explained Krybus.

QUIRKY BIO-MEMOIR OF MORDECAI RICHLER COMING IN OCTOBER

Montreal literary journalist Joel Yanofsky has written a quirky, obsessive book about the late author Mordecai Richler titled Mordecai & Me: An Appreciation of A Kind. Its publisher, Alberta's Red Deer Press, has described it as "an intimate, gossipy book" that at times resembles a "literary stalking."

In the forthcoming book, Yanofsky writes of going on a sort of quest in the year after Richler's death and tells how he consulted with a rabbi, a psychiatrist, a dream analyst and others in his search for the man behind the literary legend. He also tours Richler's old St. Urbain Street neighbourhood and visits the Bronfman mansion before reaching the conclusion that "Mordecai Richler was the most interesting character Mordecai Richler never wrote about."

The book is due for publication in October. Also on Red Deer's fall list is a revised and expanded edition of Victoria writer Stephen Scobie's Alias Bob Dylan Revisited, which first appeared in 1991.

MIAMI-COZUMEL CRUISE IS GEARED TO GENEALOGISTS

A genealogical cruise offered by the International Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies (IAJGS) departs Miami aboard Carnival's M/S Fascination on Mon., Dec. 1 and makes port calls in Key West, Fla., and Cozumel before returning to Miami on Dec. 5.

While at sea, participants will have the opportunity to attend lectures and consult with experienced Jewish genealogists and others pursuing similar research. Lectures will cover a wide range of subjects, including resources available online and at the Latter Day Saints (LDS) Family History Library and the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Daniel Schlyter and Peter Lande, specialists associated with the two above-mentioned institutions respectively, are among the scheduled speakers. Shipboard computers will be available to allow participants to search online databases.

Lectures and informal sessions have been scheduled around the port calls so that participants can fully enjoy the visits to Key West and Cozumel. Registration fo the IAJGS's first-ever genealogical cruise is limited to 300. Details available at www.iajgs.org.

Antique Judaica Road Show: Have you ever wondered where the Shabbat candlesticks your grandmother gave you came from? Or thought about that Kiddush cup you picked up at a flea market all those years ago? What about the value of that old silver dreidel?

On Sept. 21, Chicago's Spertus Museum offers an innovative program modeled after the popular television phenomenon Antiques Road Show.

Bill's Antique Judaica Road Show features Bill Gross, a leading Judaica collector and expert on Jewish sacred objects. He will survey items brought to him by members of the public and offer opinions and evaluations.

The event marks the opening of Tradition and Transformation: Treasures from the Spertus Museum, an exhibition designed to demonstrate how Jewish sacred art connects us to our past while filling our present with splendour. Spertus Museum, 618 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago. Sept. 15 to Dec. 28. www.spertus.edu.

The idea of an Antique Judaica Road Show is intriguing and one hopes someone might want to stage such an event in Canadian cities like Toronto and Montreal.

Artist influenced by strength of Israel

By ELYSSE ZAREK

CJN Intern

Two Toronto artists are holding an art exhibit, called "Openings and Closures", at the Women's Art Association Gallery Sept. 4 to 7.

Israeli-born Irit Lepkin's ceramics are influenced by the flowing, organic shapes found in nature, but she credits the "hardship and strength of Israel and everyday life" for helping her illustrate her main themes of conflict and change.

The irony of her work, she said in an artist statement, is that "soft clay is being used as a vehicle for the harsh reality of my subject matter."

Lepkin comes from an artistic family. Her father is a jeweller and her mother is a sculptor.

She said her biggest influence was the time she spent in the Middle East. Among her photographs are shots of Petra, Jordan and Tzfat, Israel.

Painter Marjorie Moeser's series, called Ventanas (windows), takes its name from her rectangular window and door shapes. Her fascination is creating a three-dimensional image on a two-dimensional surface.

"I'm constantly interested in the power of a painter to create the illusion of three dimensions on a two-dimensional surface," she said. She uses oil, acrylic and mixed media on canvas, and occasionally does photography.

Moeser began her artistic career as a landscape painter. Three years ago, she shifted her focus to abstract works. Now she paints in New Mexico and the south of France, and her choice of colours – vibrant blues, turquoises and reds – shows the influence the landscapes have on her work.

"I love the light and architecture, the culture of both places," she said. "The land really spoke to me in both those places."

HOOLIGANS

inspired by Gemarah Brachos 10a

Rabbi Meir and his wife Bruria were both talmudic scholars. They lived in Israel circa 150 CE.

"Meir, I must disagree with you. For there to be 48 or fewer Shofar blasts in the Temple daily the Sukkot holiday would have to occur on a Friday. That would put Yom Kippur on a Sunday, and you know the High Court would add a day to the preceding month to avoid that. In fact..."

Rabbi Meir and his wife Bruria's supper and talmudic debate were abruptly interrupted as a brick came sailing through the open window.

Bruria jerked back in shock as the vase in front of her shattered. Muffled laughter came from outside. Rabbi Meir jumped out of his chair and burst out of the house. Three hooligans were running away into a dark alley.

"You!" he demanded.

They turned around. "You want somethin', Rabbi?" one of them hissed. Then they turned and vanished into the alley.

Disconsolate, Rabbi Meir re-entered his house. Bruria was sweeping up the shattered vase fragments. He picked up the spring wildflowers the vase had contained, which their children had picked that morning.

"I don't know what to do, Bruria. This is the third time this week they've done something. And it's only Tuesday! They stole the wheels off our wagon and chased the children away from the well. Our life is becoming unliveable."

He sighed, and stood in contemplation. Then he looked upwards. "Please, God, take away the lives of these men who have nothing better to do with their lives than antagonize innocent people. Please..."

"Meir, what are you saying! Do you think it's right to pray that the wicked should die? Does it say in Psalms* that the sinners should vanish? No, it says that sins should vanish. Why don't you pray that they repent from their wicked ways?"

"Bruria, you're so right. What would I do without you?"

Rabbi Meir looked heavenward again, and began a slightly modified prayer. "Please, God, bring these misguided people to the proper path of Torah and good deeds. Bring purpose to their lives, and give them..."

* * * * *

Bruria was sweeping up the autumn leaves that had blown into the house when she heard someone knocking on the door. She opened the door and saw three men standing there uncomfortably. Two of them were holding wagon wheels, and one held a brand new vase.

"Uh, we're the ones who were, uh, bothering you a while ago, and lately we've been feeling, you know, bad about it."

Rabbi Meir looked up as he placed two candles in their brass candlesticks. "We're just about to leave for Rosh Hashanah services. Would you all like to join us?"

Rabbi Meir put the wheels in a corner and Bruria put the new vase on the table just where the old one had been. Then she said a blessing as she lit the candles, and with her husband and children — and three guests — set off to pray for a good and sweet year.

* Bruria's reference is to Psalms 104:35.

The magic of love

By LEILA SPEISMAN
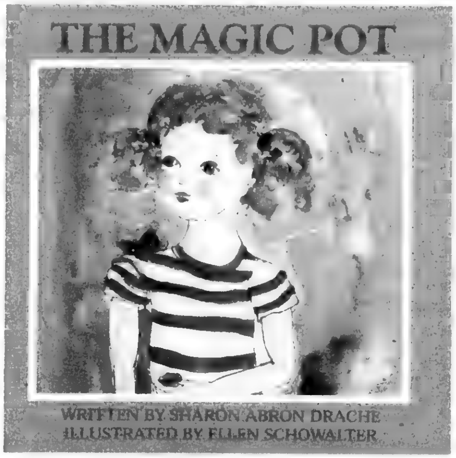
Staff Reporter

You have probably heard people say, "Beauty is in the eye of the beholder." That means we all have a different idea of what beauty is and we decide for our own reasons.



THE MAGIC POT
WRITTEN BY SHARON ABRON DRACHE
ILLUSTRATED BY ELLEN SCHOWALTER

The saying came true in Sharon Drache's new book, The Magic Pot (L'Dor Vador Publications, 2003, with illustrations by Ellen Schowalter).

Rifkeh was seven years old. She loved her grandmother, Bubbe Malke, very much, "because she was the kindest and most generous human being that Rifkeh knew." The little girl "saw her grandmother as a healthy, beautiful woman."

To other people, though, Bubbe Malke was a very short woman whose body had shrunk with arthritis, whose skin was wrinkled and who had very thin hair. In fact, they saw her as "ill and unattractive."

Bubbe Malke and Zayde were very poor. They lived in the back half of the third floor of a sixplex, and Zayde had to work two jobs.

Every Sunday, Rifkeh used to spend the morning with her grandmother. They would talk, and Bubbe Malke would make her famous chicken fricassee to eat for lunch.

One Sunday in May something different happened. Rifkeh brought Bubbe Malke a present – a "delicate copper-enamelled bird [that] hung from a chain by a loop through its upper right wing." Rifkeh's mother had bought the chain, but Rifkeh made the bird, a dove, all by herself.

Bubbe Malke was thrilled, and said that after she made the fricassee, she would change her clothes, put on the necklace, and they would "enjoy a sumptuous meal to celebrate the occasion."

But when Rifkeh looked into the pot, which was very very tiny, all she saw was "a single chicken leg and three pupeks (gizzards) swimming in the sweet tomato sauce."

That hardly seemed enough to eat for lunch and Rifkeh was upset.

Bubbe set the table with her best ivory damask tablecloth with matching napkins, two place settings of her best silverware, her Shabbat candlesticks with short white candles in them, and her good dishes, which she used only for special occasions and holy days.

Finally, she put on the necklace. When she did, something miraculous happened. Her apron became a plump velvet pillow. Her kitchen chair turned into a golden, jewelled throne, and the small pot of stew became a large soup tureen with a diamond studded silver serving spoon, filled with "the sweetest, most delicious, chunky chicken stew."

Best of all, Bubbe Malke became much taller and was dressed in a beautiful blue brocade gown. Her hair had turned thick and silver-blue, and it was decorated with tortoise shell combs.

Now, of course, none of these things had really happened. What did happen was that Rifkeh's act of kindness in giving her grandmother the necklace, and the love that flowed between the two of them, made everything appear wonderful.

Seifert ordered held pending extradition

VANCOUVER — A British Columbia Supreme Court judge last week ordered Nazi war criminal Michael Seifert taken into custody pending his possible extradition to Italy.

Seifert, a former guard at an SS camp, will be jailed pending a decision by the federal minister of justice whether to extradite him to Italy, where he was convicted in absentia of 11 murders at the Bolzano concentration camp.

In a 92-page decision, Judge Selwyn Romilly found there was sufficient evidence to commit Seifert into custody on seven of nine murder counts involving a total of nine people. An Italian military court heard evidence that Seifert starved a 15-year-old prisoner to death, gouged out a prisoner's eyes, beat prisoners before shooting them and tortured a woman before killing her and her daughter.

Defence lawyer Doug Christie, who has also defended Holocaust deniers Ernst Zundel and Jim Keegstra, argued much of the evidence against his client was circumstantial and would not stand up in a Canadian court. Christie said Seifert would appeal the judge's order. Seifert, 79, could also appeal the minister's extradition order, should it be issued.

Jewish organizations applauded the judge's decision. Canadian Jewish Congress spokesman Jack Silverstone said "it's a very positive step. There haven't been any extraditions of suspected Nazi war criminals since Helmut Rauca in the early 1980s, so it's an important achievement.

"It's taken a long time to get to his point. We hope the process will move forward as quickly as possible."

B'nai Brith Canada welcomed the court decision, stating it "marks the end of a long battle to bring Seifert to justice."

Horse trainer overcomes gambling obsession

By HARLAN C. ABBEY
Special to The CJN

FORT ERIE, Ont. — What a bar mitzvah day...hobnobbing with Don Get Smart Adams, Elizabeth Bewitched Montgomery, Richard Dr. Kildare Chamberlain, and other Hollywood stars.

Ron Pearson, 48, will never forget that day. The only problem is that the post-temple get-together took place in the clubhouse of the Hollywood Park Racetrack and the exposure to the gambling element almost took his life.

"I held a gun to my head for a few minutes," he admitted, as he discussed his years as a compulsive gambler during a recent interview at the Fort Erie Racetrack, where he now trains three horses owned by his longtime girlfriend, Lisa Schrauth.

"I was mostly betting on races," he continued. "I hocked my golf clubs, I stole from my grandfather's wallet.... I worked nights so I could go to the track days. Many times I was down to my last $2, built it up to a couple of thousand, and lost it all again."

Pearson's maternal great-grandfather was a "renowned rabbi named Bauman." But his more recent family history was pure Hollywood. His grandfather invented the cinemascope wide-angle movie lens. His father Robert – from whom he was estranged for some 20 years – was a film editor for the movie Towering Inferno, for the MASH and Wild Wild West TV series and for an Emmy-nominated TV film on boxing champion Joe Louis.

As a youngster, Pearson was an outstanding baseball player, which became a point of friction with his father: "In one Little League game I struck out 17 of the 18 batters, but Dad kept nagging me about the one boy who grounded out."

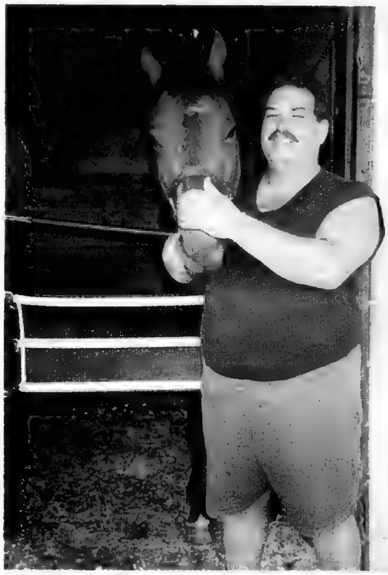
Pearson played winter league baseball well enough to be invited to the San Francisco Giants spring training, "But every winter I'd do something to hurt my arm."

In one of his games, he pitched against Kurt Russell, a good minor league second baseman who resumed his acting career after an injury cut short his baseball career. "I killed the ball that game," Pearson recalled.

"At the same time, I was gambling and I think the reason was just that I needed to feel something."

At age 22 he joined the navy and helped the navy team win the All-Service Softball Championship. Pearson worked the night shift as a data systems technician so he could go to the races in the afternoon. After discharge, "I tried sales, because everyone told me I was a great salesman. But I couldn't love the product forever."

Pearson, who as a teenager worked on the backstretch to help his gambling habit, decided to return to racing. He bought a horse at Del Mar for $1,000 (US) and took it to Texas to race: "In his first start he was third, but he didn't win until 27 more races. I didn't want to lose him in a claiming race so I kept running him over his value. He finally won at the $10,000 level – after I learned all that I didn't know about training horses. He won two or three more times and then was claimed for $5,000."



Ron Pearson and Shelter's No Fool

"For a while, I was too nervous to work for a more-experienced trainer, but finally I did. And I tried the Gamblers Anonymous program a couple of times before it finally took."

Ridding himself of his gambling habit ended the estrangement with his father: "I spent 30 years as a total jerk, but you have to forgive yourself and others. I told my dad 'You did it out of love, you thought it was right.' Now he calls and asks how the horses are doing.

"My mother was always behind me. The greatest thrill of my life was to buy her a new heat pump for $4,000."

After two months of racing at Fort Erie, Pearson's small stable already had a win with Shelter's No Fool and a second by Bevie's Dare. Summer Special recently finished fourth on a weekend when Shelter's No Fool was second and Bevie's Dare was third.

But, most important, Ron Pearson has found peace of mind: "I could be richer, but I couldn't be happier. It's nice to wake up and feel I deserve something good in life."

Israel home game ban unlikely to be lifted

By DORON BERGERFREUND
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel Football Association (IFA) chair Gavri Levi last week played down the chances of a return to international football in Israel in the near future. European soccer's governing body, UEFA, was due to discuss the issue when it convened in Monaco after The CJN went to press.

"A week or two ago I was sure UEFA would sanction a return to international soccer in Israel, but the collapse of the ceasefire has of course caused enormous damage... At the moment it would be preferable for us if the issue wasn't raised," Levi said.

The recent suicide bus bombing in Jerusalem wasn't the first time a terrorist attack had prevented an end to the ban on European games being played in Israel, Levi noted.

"A year ago in Istanbul, I had been about to persuade UEFA to positively consider the issue," Levi said. "But the bombing on Allenby Street an hour after UEFA had decided to send envoys here to examine the situation caused enormous embarrassment."

The IFA believes UEFA will delay for another few weeks any decision on lifting the ban, which was imposed close to two years ago after an attack on a Tel Aviv restaurant frequented by footballers.

At the end of July, just before Maccabi Tel Aviv's Champions League qualifier against the Slovakian team, Zilina, UEFA delayed a decision on the ban, saying it needed more time to evaluate developments in the region.

Two weeks ago, just hours prior to the suicide bombing in Jerusalem that left 21 people dead, UEFA once again postponed its decision.

Intense diplomatic pressure had been applied on UEFA to lift the ban, and while the cease-fire was in place a return to international football in Israel appeared to have been on the cards.

Now that the ceasefire has collapsed, Levi's pessimism seems well founded.

The hypocrisy of comfort

In memory of the Jews who died on the #2 bus in Jerusalem Aug. 19

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Why aren't more Jews angrier? Why aren't more Jews active?

When was it that we allowed a few irresponsible corporations to dump toxic chemicals into our waters, so that our country's beautiful lakes are polluted? Where did our sky go? Weren't you surprised when the lights went off, and the incredible vastness of voluminous stars shone down on us?

How is it that we who live in one of the greatest times in history, in perhaps the most wealthy country and continent ever, watch while innocent villagers in dozens of countries around the world are raped and slaughtered?

Where is our anger? Where is our willingness to act? Why has success made so many of us relaxed?

Our lives are short. We exist for but a night in the calendar of history. Ask yourself then, what are you doing for Israel and the Jewish people while you are alive? Are you really sacrificing for the betterment of the Jewish state and Israelis? Have you travelled there in the last five years, spent money on Israeli goods, invested in Israeli companies? Have you considered opening a branch of your business in Israel, or perhaps supplementing your condominium in Florida with one in Netanya?

What have you done for the Jews of Argentina and the former Soviet Union? Have you sighed deeply, and then acted on behalf of elderly Jews subsisting on potato skins in Kiev, or formerly middle-class Jewish families now living in shantytowns outside of Buenos Aires?

The Torah does not state that we should always walk around in sack-clothes and ashes. We are told to be joyful and celebrate the beauty of the world. The Torah has countless laws on how to treat one's trees and surroundings. It's OK to teach your children how to ski, do a pirouette, play hockey and swim.

But we are also told, "If the community is in trouble, a person must not say, 'I will go home, and eat and drink, and my soul will be at peace'" (Talmud, Ta'anit). We are commanded to be aware of the world around us and take care of its widows, orphans and the impoverished.

As Rosh Hashanah approaches, consider your role in the world. Ask yourself if you are investing resources toward the betterment of it, and not just with cash. Look at your hands for the calluses.

With e-mail, the Internet, strong, free governments, the free press and great financial resources available to us, there is no reason why evil cannot be neutralized so its ugly head is buried in the proverbial sand forever. Ask Craig Kilburger, from Scarborough, who at 13 years old started a group called Free the Children and put child labour on the world's map.

One logical outcome of all the Holocaust education we have invested in might be for more Jews to take action on behalf of the widows in Kiev, the children in Uganda with growling stomachs and the impoverished in Argentina and their weakening pleas for help.

We are a rich nation with an almost unlimited freedom to challenge imbalances. Adopt an inequity and beat it. You can. We can. It's Jewish.

The more valuable the thing, the more effort it demands. – Saadia Gaon

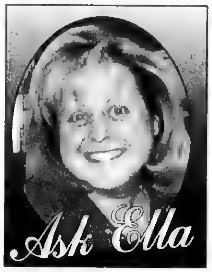
About Life



Dear Ella,

My parents are wonderful people, but they are both Holocaust survivors and are still not confident when it comes to the English language.

They have a tendency to hear things incorrectly and are too embarrassed to admit they didn't quite understand.

The most dangerous place this happens is in doctors' offices, and I am the one who accompanies them to each visit.

At their age, between the two of them, there are at least one or two appointments every week.

I have a brother who also takes an interest in them, but by telephone only. I am the one who has to take time away from my family and job to handle everything because I'm "the daughter."

I need my brother to stand up to the plate and do his part. How should I handle this?

Daughter Does All

Dear Daughter Does All,

You sound like a loving and responsible daughter. Families are very complex and each has its own dynamics. It's not unusual for parents to lean more heavily on their daughters.

The lucky thing is that you do have a sibling. The fact that he calls regularly suggests to me that he cares. It's not a far reach to take him that extra step to getting more involved.

You've been handling things so well he may not realize you are unhappy with the situation. He is comfortable that things are getting done and your parents are well cared for by someone he trusts impeccably – you!

Sit down with him and set up some rules without being confrontational, as by now you've probably built up some resentment. Work out a deal. Maybe he can handle your dad's doctors visits and you handle your mom's, or he can take one week and you take the other. However you work it out, let him know how you are feeling and draw the line.

Give him the chance to step up to the plate. It's amazing what people will do when they have to.

UJA Federation Campaign 2004

FOR ISRAEL AND THE JEWISH WORLD

Today, we live in a dramatically different and dangerous world. Nearly 6,000 Israelis are dealing with terrorism related injuries – many for life. Israel is struggling with its worst recession ever, while pursuing peace, combating terror and trying to fund a crucial social service system. At the same time, millions around the world, overcome by virulent anti-Israel and anti-Semitic sentiment, question Israel's existence. For the first time in more than half a century, there is no guarantee that our children will be living in a better world than we enjoy.

HOW YOU CAN HELP

With dangerous forces confronting us, we are asking you to consider matching your gift increase last year or contributing more on behalf of Israel and the Jewish world.

For Israel and the Jewish World

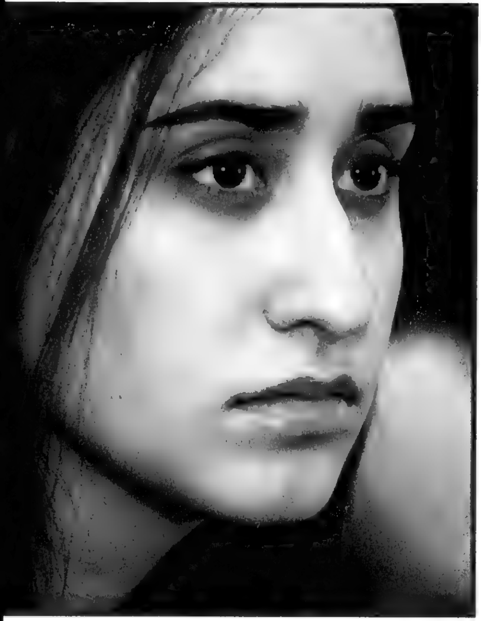
A SPECIAL CAMPAIGN

Daunting challenges confront today's Jewish world. In response, UJA Federation is expanding the emergency projects that we funded last year. All Campaign 2004 contributions beyond those required for our core needs will be allocated to three strategic initiatives.

THREE URGENT NEEDS

1. Financial support for Israel's deteriorating social service network, including additional help for children whose parents were killed in terror attacks.
2. Stepped up efforts to combat a worldwide wave of anti-Israel and anti-Semitic hatred, through the new national Israel Emergency Cabinet.
3. Education and training for our next Jewish generation to answer those who preach anti-Israel and anti-Semitic hatred.

UJA FEDERATION



1. PROTECTING ISRAEL'S SOCIAL SERVICES

Israel's social service system is strained to the limit. Approximately 40% of Israel's children are suffering from some form of post-traumatic stress disorder. At least 300,000 Israelis are out of work. Government benefits have been cut for many of Israel's vulnerable and most Israelis report a reduced standard of living. Without our help, Israel simply cannot afford the cost of recovering from her worst recession ever, escalating security needs, the pursuit of peace and full funding for social welfare services. Additional UJA Federation Campaign 2004 donations will help to maintain the survival of vital human services such as payments to young people who have lost one or more parents in terror attacks, trauma centres, summer camps, day care facilities, after-school programs and services for Israel's most vulnerable.

WE'LL ALWAYS BE THERE

At 21, I am the oldest of five children. In June 2002, a suicide bomber murdered my father and 18 others on a bus from Gilo. Life will never be the same for me or my family. Thanks to your generosity, the Jewish Agency (JAFI) Orphans Fund is there for young people like me. But more important than the money we received is the feeling of strength we gain from knowing how much you care.

Yifat Aluf, Gilo

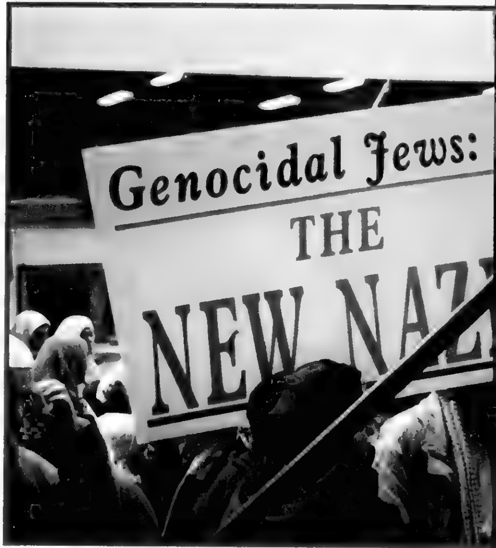
2. COUNTERING HATRED

Malicious anti-Israel and anti-Semitic activity has soared to levels unseen since World War II. Last year, the number of violent anti-Semitic incidents worldwide rose by 36%. In Canada, schools, synagogues and cemeteries have been vandalized or defaced. Over the past two years, three bombings of Jewish facilities have occurred in Edmonton alone. Rabbis and other visibly Jewish individuals are being assaulted throughout Europe. Through the new Israel Emergency Cabinet, Campaign 2004 will help to counter this distressing anti-Israel and anti-Semitic tide, through, among other initiatives, building partnerships with non-Jewish community leaders.



FROM THE FRONT LINES OF ANTI-SEMITISM

Before moving to Israel in January 2003, I lived in Paris with my wife and three children, where I owned a successful hair salon. It became commonplace for my clients to make anti-Semitic comments right in front of me. Buses in Jewish neighborhoods were pelted with stones; anti-Israel graffiti was found all over the walls. One day, my daughter told me that children at her school played a game called 'Palestinians.' They chose one child to be the Israeli, and threw stones at him. That was when I knew there was no future for my family in France. And that is why your help is so urgent.

Hanan Elkayam, Ashdod

3. EMPOWERING A NEW JEWISH GENERATION

For many Jewish university students, the challenge of responding to attacks against Israel and confronting intimidation on campus is a daily occurrence. Universities are curtailing contacts with Israeli academics. Canadian campus organizations, such as Hillel, funded by UJA Federation, frequently repel vigorous efforts to prevent Israelis and sympathizers with Israel from speaking. UJA Federation Campaign 2004 proceeds will be invested in programs for students to learn how to confidently defend Israel. The new Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, at the University of Toronto, will include an expertly staffed and fully equipped Israel Advocacy Centre as part of its spacious, multifunctional facility. Campaign 2004 donations will also provide Israel education for high school students and help to send Jewish young people on powerful Israel experience programs, with life-long impact, such as birthright Israel.

HELPING STUDENTS FEEL SAFE

Jewish students are feeling more intimidated and anxious than ever about standing up for what they believe. In the hallways, they fear confrontation just for being Jewish. In the classroom, students are worried about answering professors or teaching assistants who make inappropriate comments about Israel. Jewish students need to feel safe on campus. They need the answers and training necessary to take a proud stand in support of Israel and the Jewish world.

CAMPAIGN 2004

MEETING CORE COMMUNITY NEEDS

In addition to funding urgent, special needs during these troubling times, your gift to UJA Federation Campaign 2004 will help thousands of Jews in our own community and those who live under difficult circumstances around the world.

- This year, UJA Federation is investing an unprecedented $11 million in Jewish education for 17,000 children in the day and supplementary school system. Nearly $8 million will provide tuition subsidies to parents who can't afford full fees at Jewish day schools.
- In partnership with community agencies, UJA Federation support is assisting our most vulnerable by helping more than 1000 households meet their daily needs; financing counseling services for over 400 abused women and children and enabling more than 600 children with special requirements to experience Jewish summer camp.
- UJA Federation provides substantial financial support for critical Israeli and overseas programs, such as aliyah from countries of distress and immigrant absorption.

What will tomorrow hold if we don't act today?

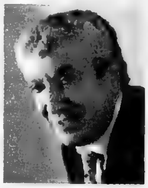
Canadian helps preserve Libyan Jewish heritage

By MIRIAM SHAVIV
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — A stern-looking, middle aged man with a Turkish fez and a twirly mustache in soft charcoal. A shy-looking bride and her groom, posing awkwardly with a passing Allied soldier during World War II. Two wealthy teenage brothers in modern three-piece suits, having their formal portraits taken at the turn of the century.

These are just some of the portraits in a new exhibition about Libyan Jewry, which opened late last month at the Centre for the Heritage of Libyan Jews in Or Yehuda, a suburb of Tel Aviv. The NIS 100,000 needed to refurbish the wing of the museum, and to sponsor the exhibition, was donated by a Canadian Jew of Libyan descent, Walter Arbib.



Walter Arbib

"The Libyan community was one of the oldest in the region, but we were forced to leave the country," Arbib says. "They tried to cancel our history, even building a highway on top of our cemetery. We need a place to show the community is still alive and vibrant."

The opening of the "Faces Tell The Story" exhibit was attended by some 400 people – more than twice as many as expected – including the Italian ambassador to Israel, former Canadian ambassador to Tehran Ken Taylor, and representatives of the Canadian embassy.

One fights West Nile, one helps predict lung cancer

By YUVAL DROR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Medical researchers in Israel last week reported two findings that have potentially far-reaching health benefits.

Two scientists have come up with a revolutionary new drug that they believe will slow down the spread of West Nile fever among those already infected with the virus.

The drug – Omr-IgG-am – was developed jointly by Prof. Bracha Rager, former Health Ministry chief scientist and senior staff member at the health science faculty's department of microbiology and immunology at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev in Be'er Sheva, and David Ben-Natan of the Nes Tziona Biological Institute.

Omr-IgG-am, which is manufactured by Omrix, a biopharmaceuticals company that has research and development facilities at the Weizmann Science Park in Nes Tziona, is based on immunoglobulin, a protein group found in the blood's liquid component.

"This group contains all the antibodies that a human develops in his lifetime once he is exposed to bacteria, viruses and the like," Rager said.

The researchers succeeded in isolating the "defensive antibodies" produced from a group of proteins taken from Israeli blood donors who had come in contact with the virus. The antibodies were injected into rats who had been infected with the West Nile virus. The fact that the rats survived the disease

Students to Israel

TORONTO — Four Canadians are among 51 recent graduates of United Synagogue Youth, the high school wing of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, who are heading to Israel for the next nine months to study, tour, volunteer and learn new leadership techniques as part of USY's Nativ program. The Canadians are Leora Kimmel of Ottawa, Rachel Hindel of Toronto, David Goldberg of Hamilton and Rosa Blumenfeld of Vancouver.

Shalom in Morocco

JERUSALEM — Morocco may re-establish some diplomatic ties with Israel. The two countries established a team to work toward reinstating ties, which were curtailed after the start of the Palestinian intifadah in September 2000. The deal came after a meeting last week in Morocco between Moroccan King Mohammed VI and Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom. Morocco played a major behind-the-scenes role in Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts in the 1990s.

Arad Alive?

JERUSALEM — Ron Arad, the Israeli navigator captured when his plane was shot down over Lebanon in 1986, is likely still alive, a new report says. There is no evidence to refute the assumption he is still alive, according to a study presented to army chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Moshe Ya'alon. After bailing out of his jet, he was believed to have been captured and held by pro-Iranian troops in Lebanon. The last word that he was alive was received in 1987.

WORLD

Iranian Denied Bail

LONDON — An Iranian diplomat arrested in England in connection with the 1994 car bombing of Argentina's main Jewish community centre was denied bail late last month. The Iranian government, which denies involvement in the bombing and has threatened sanctions over the arrest of Hadi Soleimanpour, offered nearly $800,000 (US) in bail, and Soleimanpour's family offered another $300,000, Reuters reported. Argentina accuses Soleimanpour, 47, of involvement in the bombing of the AMIA centre that killed 85 people, and wants him extradited from Britain.

Balfour Released

BEIRUT — A Lebanese court last week cleared a Canadian missionary of charges of spying for Israel. The court found Bruce Balfour guilty of stirring religious strife, but sentenced him to time served. Prosecutors had accused Balfour, who was arrested in July, of spying on Hezbollah for Israel. He arrived back in Canada late last week. His organization, Cedars of Lebanon, is dedicated to reviving Lebanon's cedar forests.

New Claims Deadline

NEW YORK — The International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims is extending the deadline for potential claimants to check its lists of unclaimed policies and file a claim. The new deadline is Dec. 31. Details on the claims process, including a copy of the form, can be found on the Web at www.icheic.org, or by calling 1-800-496-1974.

Pollard in Court

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Convicted spy Jonathan Pollard appeared in a U.S. court last week for a hearing requested by his lawyers to reduce his sentence and set him free. The former U.S. Navy analyst was convicted in 1987 of passing secret documents to Israel and sentenced to life in jail. His lawyers argued that Pollard, 49, received ineffective counsel from his original lawyer at his trial, when he pleaded guilty, and from another lawyer in his first appeal in the early 1990s. It's not known when the judge will rule.

New Probe Launched into Police Conduct

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials have launched a new probe into police behaviour in the killing of 12 Israeli Arabs and a Palestinian in riots that occured October 2000.

The Justice Ministry's Police Investigation Department launched the inquiry following the release last week of the Orr Commission report into the riots.

The Orr report was critical of Ehud Barak, Israel's prime minister at the time, saying he had not been sufficiently aware of the potentially explosive situation in the Arab sector, but did not find that his actions should prevent him from serving again as prime minister.

The report accused the former internal security minister, Shlomo Ben-Ami, of a "significant failure" in not preparing police for wide-scale Arab riots, and recommended that he not serve again in the post.

The commission also criticized police, including former commander Yehuda Wilk, for their relations with the Arab sector, and also criticized Arab Knesset members Azmi Beshara and Abdulmalik Dehamshe, along with Islamic Movement leader Raed Salah, for inciting violence, but it did not recommend sanctions against them.

Barak established the Orr Commission after the riots by Israeli Arabs – part of protests in solidarity with Palestinians in the early days of the intifadah – turned deadly.

Education tax credit key issue in Ont. election

Eves, McGuinty, Hampton running for premier's office

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

What's old is still new: funding of private, faith-based schools – or more accurately, the Equity in Education Tax Credit – is emerging as a hot-button issue for the Jewish community in the Oct. 2 provincial election called last week by Premier Ernie Eves.

The future of the measure hangs in the balance in the vote, as Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty, who is ahead in the polls, has vowed to scrap the credit.

Introduced by the Conservatives in the 2001 budget, the tax credit provides parents of children in Jewish day schools with some relief. To be phased in over the next five years, the credit was designed to be worth up to $3,500 per child annually by 2006.

It's a major plank in the Tory platform, appealing especially to voters in ridings with large Jewish populations.

"It's a make-it-or break-it issue for us," said Simon Rosenblum of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

McGuinty, who told a CJC Ontario executive meeting in 1998 that he had no ideological opposition to public funding of private schools, has come out firmly against the tax credit, claiming it will drain up to $500 million a year from the public and separate school systems.

He and other Liberals have pledged to repeal the measure, which would put its Jewish advocates back to square one.

But not all Jewish families support the credit. Those with children in public schools have made their opposition to it known.

To gauge where candidates stand on the credit and other issues, CJC has sent a questionnaire to all party hopefuls in 15 ridings. It asks six questions of candidates seeking election in ridings in Hamilton, Kitchener-Waterloo, Ottawa, London, Kingston, Thunder Bay, Sudbury and Windsor.

In the Toronto area, questionnaires have been sent to ridings with the highest concentration of Jewish voters: Don Valley East, Eglinton-Lawrence, St. Paul's, Thornhill, Vaughan-King-Aurora, Willowdale and York Centre.

The question on the tax credit reads: "Do you agree that this tax measure be continued or that it not be removed until an alternative acceptable to the parties involved be implemented?"

Other questions probe candidates on infusing $250 million into home health care, which would return funding to 1998 levels; the establishment of a provincial hate crimes registry; boosting the shelter allowance component of social assistance; relaxing restrictions on eligibility for special-needs students; and increasing the budgets of police services.

The results will be published in the Sept. 27 issue of The CJN. "People will draw their own conclusions," Rosenblum said.

Pundits are predicting some tight races in several Toronto-area ridings.

- In Don Valley East, incumbent Liberal David Caplan, 38, first elected to the legislature in 1997, could face a stiff challenge from Tory Paul Sutherland, a Toronto city councillor and former deputy mayor of North York. In the last vote, Caplan was hailed as a giant killer for defeating then education minister Dave Johnson. Also running is the New Democrats' Murphy Browne, a community and labour activist.
- In Eglinton-Lawrence, Corrine Korzen has already made history for being the first Orthodox woman to seek election as an MPP. A lawyer and former teacher, Korzen, a Tory, faces an uphill struggle against popular Liberal incumbent Mike Colle. Robin Alter, a psychologist and teacher, will carry the NDP banner. The riding has a small Jewish population, but it includes the Bathurst-Lawrence area, with its high concentration of Orthodox residents, many of whom have become signed-up members of the federal Canadian Alliance party.

JEWISH NATIONAL FUND OF TORONTO is pleased to announce that the 2003 Negev Dinner Honourees are ELI AND RENÉE RUBINSTEIN
in recognition of excellence in communal leadership and dedication to Israel
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 2003
at the Sheraton Centre Hotel, 6:00 P.M.

JNF
JEWISH NATIONAL FUND OF CANADA

The 55th Annual JNF Toronto Negev Dinner will salute Eli and Renée Rubinstein, outstanding leaders of our community. A major project in Israel which will benefit from the proceeds of this tribute to the Rubinsteins will be announced at the official "Kick-Off" of the Campaign on September 24. Almost 200 volunteers and canvassers will comprise the Dinner Executive, Campaign Team and Tribute Committee, under the leadership of JNF Toronto President Frank A. Wilson and Campaign Chairman Ron Frisch.

Renée and Eli bear witness to the triumph of the human spirit. Instead of succumbing to despair, their Holocaust survivor parents picked up the pieces of their shattered lives and successfully reconstructed them. Oscar and Magda Reichner in New York and Bill and Judith Rubinstein in Toronto. Eli was born in a Displaced Persons' Camp in northern Italy, and arrived in Canada with his parents as an infant in October 1948. Today, Eli is a partner in his family's firm, H&R Developments and President of H&R Development's Property Management Division, following his earlier career as a lecturer in the Religious Studies Department at the University of Toronto.

Renée was born and raised in New York City, and came to live in Toronto when she married Eli. They have four children - Tamar and her husband Jonathan Koschitzky live in Israel with their four children; Ilan is married to Dana Schwerdt and they live in New York; Erez and Hadassa. They are proud, knowledgeable and traditionally observant Jews who are at the same time fully attuned to and comfortable in the world at large.

Eli is the National President of Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University. He has served as President of the Bnei Akiva Schools in Toronto, and as President of the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce and Industry. He is also a past officer of Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region, and has been actively involved with many other community groups and organizations. He co-chaired the Task Force on Assimilation, Intermarriage and Jewish Identity in Ontario for CJC. In 1987, Eli established Canadel Development Limited which has since been involved in significant real estate projects in Israel. Canadel just recently received the 2003 Israel Trade Award in recognition of the company's "outstanding contribution to strengthening investments in Israel".

Renée served for over a decade as the President of the Canadian Friends of Ezrath Nashim Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem. Over the years, many other organizations have benefitted from Renée's dynamic talent and enthusiasm, including the Israel Biotechnical Institute, Emunah Women of Toronto, the Canadian Friends of Shaare Zedek Hospital, the Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital, Kosher Meals on Wheels, Tikvah Layeled, Zichron Menachem, Mekorot Institute, Sasson VeSimcha, and the Hebrew Academy for Special Children (HASC). Renée has also been a volunteer for many years with the Women's Chevra Kadisha in Toronto.

The Rubinsteins, both as individuals and as a family, have demonstrated in so many ways their exceptional devotion to serving the needs of our community and of the people of Israel. Jewish National Fund and our community are proud to pay tribute to them.

Two years later...

From the editor's desk

Many of us were disappointed, even shocked, when Prime Minister Jean Chrétien speculated that the United States might have somehow brought the atrocities of 9/11 upon itself because of the resentment the superpower engenders in certain parts of the world as a result of its incomparable wealth and its aggressive policies.

To be sure, the prime minister condemned terrorism and terrorists. But still, his musings, in effect, lent support to the "root cause" apologists who prefer to blame the targets of terrorists rather than the terrorists themselves for taking innocent life.

Two years have elapsed since that unbelievably horrific day when humanity was mocked by bloodlusting hatred.

Irrational, xenophobic, impervious to the penetration of modern thought, or even to the goodwill gestures of fellow human beings, the hatred is all-consuming. Among like thinkers, it has spread throughout the four corners of the globe like a contagion, targeting the big Satan, i.e., the United States and the democratic West, and the little Satan, i.e., Israel and the Jews.

Ironically, but not surprisingly, many of the people who embrace these foul hatreds also embrace the "root cause" theories regarding terrorism. They cannot see the inconsistencies and the contradictions in their beliefs, for such is the blinding nature of hate.

A study released by the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) earlier this month, titled Unravelling Anti-Semitic 9/11 Conspiracy Theories, eloquently but alarmingly, illustrates the point.

Root cause theorists, in great measure, blame the attacks of 9/11 upon the Middle East policies of the United States. If the U.S. were not so pro-Israel, they believe, the attacks against America would not have happened.

And yet, some of these very same root cause proponents also believe that Israelis and Jews actually perpetrated the 9/11 attacks.

According to the report, the idea of Jewish or Israeli involvement in 9/11 has gained widespread acceptance in the Arab and Muslim world, parts of Europe and even in the United States.

"The 9/11 attacks have fuelled an entire new genre of anti-Semitic conspiracy theories leading to an environment where rumours about Jews are finding acceptance in the mainstream," said Abraham H. Foxman, ADL national director, when the report was released on Sept. 2.

The "Big Lie," as the ADL calls the conspiracy theories, "shows no signs of diminishing. In fact, it is finding new acceptance every day. That is not just disturbing," Foxman said, "but tragic, because we cannot win the war against terrorism without first winning over the hearts and minds of people in the Arab world who accept anti-Semitic 9/11 conspiracies as fact."

The report also suggests that these latest calumnies against Jews have brought together a disparate group of Jew-haters who are using the Big Lie to plant an entirely fresh field of anti-Semitism.

The report chronicles the spread of the Big Lie, as well as "the more recent manifestations and permutations." It concludes, inter alia:

- "The Big Lie has united American far-right extremists and white supremacists and elements within the Arab and Muslim world that are exchanging and repeating information, ideas and conspiracy theories.
- "The conspiracy theories are essentially updated versions of classical anti-Semitic canards, claiming that Jews are inherently evil and intent on manipulating and controlling world events to their own benefit… essentially a modern reiteration of the anti-Semitic Protocols of the Elders of Zion.
- "Sept. 11 conspiracies have spawned an entire industry that includes anti-Semitic books, pamphlets, videotapes, Web sites and speakers.
- "Sept. 11 conspiracies have laid the foundation for the proliferation of similar conspiracy theories about other global disasters. For example, some conspiracy theorists claim Israel was complicit in the destruction of Space Shuttle Columbia and suggest that shuttle astronaut Col. Ilan Ramon was actually a 'spy' for Israel. Others blame Jews and Israelis for 'pushing' the U.S. into war against Saddam Hussein.
- "The accusation that Jews plotted the attacks has fuelled more traditional canards about Jews, including those claiming that Jews have a 'master plan' for world domination, and that Jews use the blood of non-Jews to make holiday breads and pastries (blood libel)."

Ground Zero

Seventy years after the Nazis came to power, 58 years after they were defeated, the ADL reports the following: "Never in the history of the Jewish people has one terrible lie about 'Jewish control' spread so quickly… The Big Lie has been repeated by imams, the press and government officials in the Arab world, and is contributing to disturbing and dangerous mutation in global anti-Semitism."

How terribly sad. –MBD

CO-OPERATIVE EFFORT: A workshop for repairing orthopedic equipment, opened in Huambo, Angola, earlier this month. The opening was the culmination of more than a year of co-operation between Angola and the Israeli aid organization Yad Sarah, whose 6,000 volunteers and small paid staff lend medical equipment and provide a wide range of home care support services. The joint effort and aid were initiated and financed by the Israeli Ministry for Foreign Affairs and the Israeli embassy in Angola. A team from Yad Sarah went to Angola this summer to set up the workshop and instruct the local team. Now the largest voluntary organization in Israel, Yad Sarah was founded in 1976 by current Jerusalem mayor Uri Lupolianski.

Israeli consul Ben Hillel returns to Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Zehavit Ben Hillel, Israeli consul in Toronto for the past three years, is about to return to Israel now that her term here is over, but Toronto – and Montreal – will still occupy many of her non-work hours.

The Nes Tziona native plans to complete her Master's degree at Hebrew University's Institute for Contemporary Jewry on the subject of Montreal Jews who migrated to Toronto and their assimilation into the community here. She will also continue to work for Israel's foreign ministry, full-time, initiating a new European desk in its hasbarah/public affairs department.

Ben Hillel said she is "psyched" about returning to her studies. She was always intrigued by the relationship of North American Jews and their Israeli counterparts, and she was struck by the number of people in Toronto's organized Jewish community who told her they were originally from Montreal.

"Demography fascinates me," she said. "I like to read a table and take so much information out of it."

Ben Hillel was scheduled to leave Toronto Aug. 31, but a last-minute staffing decision extended her stay by two weeks. Her scheduled replacement, Ofir Gendelman, was reassigned to Ottawa; and Avraham Lev-Louis, Ben Hillel's counterpart at Israel's embassy in Ottawa, is taking over her position as second-in-command at the Israeli consulate in Toronto.

Zehavit Ben Hillel

The reason for the change may have to do with the increased volume of work in the Toronto office, as evidenced by frequent interruptions during a recent interview, with Ben Hillel excusing herself to sign documents and answer questions. The number of olim from Toronto, she noted, has increased "tremendously," she said.

"I had a wonderful three years," Ben Hillel said, although the onset of the current intifadah in September 2000, two months after she arrived from a posting in Peru, meant an abrupt change in focus.

"I thought the whole emphasis of my work here would be different. I thought I would be more involved in cultural events. Instead I found myself dealing with hasbarah and the press. Everything going on in Israel took most of my time."

Coincidentally, her extended stay means she has been in town for the Toronto International Film Festival, which has four Israeli films this year.

"I'm very happy that even though things are hectic politically, we find the time and the resources for this. We call it 'Yisrael hayafah' [Beautiful Israel], and we really believe that. It's a term we use to put aside politics and conflict, and put on our agenda all the scientific and cultural achievements in the last 55 years. There's so much more to Israel."

Ben Hillel said she is still optimistic about peace. "This is our home – every person in the community knows that Israel is his home. If it's going to take five or 10 more years, we'll work hard… Maybe we're a little more realistic now, knowing what we're dealing with."

It warmed her heart, she said, to see how the Toronto Jewish community has supported Israel during her stay here.

CUBAN BRIS: The Canadian Friends of Cuban Jewry (CFCJ) recently welcomed back Rabbi Menachem Grunblat, left, and Rabbi David Birman, right, from the group's 79th mission to Cuba. The rabbis were head counsellors of the organization's 10th annual summer camp in Havana, where two campers were circumcised by a mohel flown to the island. The boys are holding signs proclaiming their new Hebrew names, Moshe and Mordechai. The CFCJ is preparing for its 80th mission in time for the High Holy Days.

Toronto shuk draws thousands

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Deep in the heart of Spadina Village, nestled in a tree-lined park, the smell of barbecued hamburgers and fresh falafels filled the air. Dozens of hands beat rhythmically on the drums, while merchants hawked their wares in the shuk, or marketplace.

Several thousand people gathered in Suydam Park at Spadina and Strathearn roads on Sunday for the second annual Shuk in the Park, an outdoor event featuring Israeli goods, live music and kosher food. The weather was perfect: sunny and warm.

Jointly organized by Olive Branch for Israel and Reviving Eden, all the proceeds went to Orr Shalom, an Israeli welfare organization that provides foster homes for children in need.

Olive Branch founder Grae Sibelman was the driving force behind Shuk. Dressed in a bright blue t-shirt with "Shuk Team" emblazoned across the front and "Drama Queen PhD" on the back, with a blaring walkie-talkie pinned to her hip, she said planning for the event was a full-time job. But unlike last year, when her team threw it together in six weeks, this year they worked with Reviving Eden and had three months to plan the event.

And unlike last year's Shuk, which imported Israeli goods directly to Toronto, this year's organizers used Israeli products that were already in Canada. Among the vendors were Mitzy and Allan Pollock, who were selling t-shirts with Hebrew slogans.

"It's a great day for [Shuk in the Park]," said Mitzy. By mid-afternoon, they had already sold most of the children's shirts. "We're hoping to sell all the shirts today… otherwise we'll bring them out at the next event and sell them then."

A throng of ladies surrounded Marshall Duskes, who drove down from Montreal with his sister Jessica to sell his Ahava creams and soaps.

"We're doing good business," Duskes said. Ahava products are hard to find – most Ahava users ask family or friends who are visiting Israel to buy bottles for them – so people were stocking up, he explained.

The Shuk also included a nargila rental, live music by Toronto and Montreal bands and arts and crafts.

Event organizer and Reviving Eden founder Leah Gitterman, 25, was thrilled with the turnout.

"This makes us really happy," she said, surveying the scene from the corner of the park, beneath a towering tree planted in her grandfather's memory. "This is wonderful.

"Israel has a lot to show of its culture and we wanted to bring Israeli culture to Toronto," she said. "We wanted to raise money for Orr Shalom and we wanted to bring the community together, because we really need that right now."

Moral obscenity

The three-week blitzkrieg by the evangelical Jews for Jesus Christians to convert Jews in the Greater Toronto Area away from Judaism ends on Sunday. The Toronto campaign is part of a five-year, worldwide program launched by this group in 2001 to target communities with more than 25,000 Jews.

Some individuals, Christians and Jews, while perhaps annoyed with the aggressive proselytizing, prefer to simply accept the annoyance as the price of the evangelicals' right to freedom of speech. The evangelicals, of course, claim merely to be acting out of love, indeed, responding to a higher call.

The former attitude is misguided; the latter, a stare-in-your-face deceit.

Let there be no misunderstanding or mistaking the import of this high-handed campaign. These evangelicals are actively trying to eliminate adherence to the Jewish faith. In this, they are the inheritors of the early church fathers who abhorred Jewish institutions; they are the legatees of every Inquisitor who sought to root out Jewish practices; they are, in a profound way, partners in persecution with every tyrant who decided to rid his kingdom of Jews.

That there are Christians today still committed to the odious dogma of de-Judaizing the Jews is as breathtakingly disheartening as it is deplorable. Only in the blackest region of an evil heart is it acceptable to believe that our vast earth should be bereft of Jews. Do these oxymoronically named Jews for Jesus not see that their dogma lodges them squarely in that same black space?

Typical of the tasteless tactics of the evangelicals was the placement last week of a large billboard in the heart of a heavily Jewish neighbourhood, known to be populated by many survivors of Hitler. The billboard prominently featured the kindly, doe-eyed face of a older woman, identified as a survivor, alongside a plea to the public to "hear her story."

The use and placement of that sign was insensitive and offensive in the extreme. It exploited the empathetic associations most of us have for survivors even as it targeted those very same survivors, many of whom, undoubtedly, might have been confused by the suggestion on the billboard. Thanks, however, to the complaints of an outraged public and to the intervention of the Canadian Jewish Congress, the billboard was removed within 24 hours.

To target the Jewish religion in this manner and in any manner, is simply unacceptable. It is an affront to all Jews. But to do so at a time when fundamentalists of another stripe are literally targeting Jewish lives and when anti-Semitism is on the rise in many parts of the globe, is a moral obscenity.

We commend and thank all community leaders, professionals and volunteers, especially Jews for Judaism, who have heroically opposed the evangelicals in defence of the Jewish faith.

Support equity funding in education

A provincial election in Ontario has now been called, and with it, the fate of the Equity in Education Tax Credit hangs in balance. The Ontario Jewish community has been struggling for provincial funding of Jewish day schools for decades, and the provincial Conservative party has been the only party that has taken concrete steps to redress this long-standing source of inequity. The Liberal and NDP parties are unfortunately threatening to repeal this funding if elected. As such, it is incumbent upon our community to do all it can to protect this source of funding of our schools, which are so critical to our well-being.

I urge The CJN to issue the strongest possible statement in support of the Equity in Education Tax Credit.

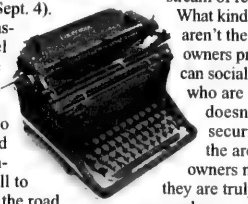
Kirshner shouldn't copy dailies

In his column of Sept. 4, Sheldon Kirshner writes that Israel assassinated Mohammed Sidr in Hebron ("Collapse of the hudna may imperil road map," CJN, Sept. 4). But as Kirshner should know, Israel did not assassinate this particular terrorist. The Israel Defence Forces set out to arrest him, but he resisted and was killed in the ensuing gun battle. This is no mere quibble over words. It's the kind of mis-statement that's all too common in mainstream media – and the kind of subtle bias that led 65 per cent of respondents to a recent Globe and Mail online poll to say they believe Israel would be to blame if the road map peace plan were to fail.



Later in the same article, Kirshner writes, "By way of response [to Israel's killing of Ismail Abu Shanab], Hamas and Islamic Jihad… abandoned the ceasefire."

Why doesn't Kirshner consider the murder of 21 civilians, or any of the other murders and attempted murders he documents in the article, to be a prior abandonment of the ceasefire? In fact, exactly when did Hamas and Islamic Jihad actually observe their own farcical ceasefire?

We have all come to expect that some of the mainstream dailies try to give the appearance of fairness when covering the Middle East conflict while subtly focusing all blame on Israel. What surprises me is that Kirshner is following their example.

Correcting misimpressions

The article on the BJCC Keepsake Video ("BJCC project puts seniors' life stories on videos," CJN, Sept. 4) is great exposure for our project, but it may have inadvertently left two misimpressions that I wish to correct.

The release of suppressed emotions is the most delicate area of the interviewing process. Unfortunately, I am there to facilitate the telling of the interviewees' stories and not to counsel them. In speaking to interviewees before the taping, I try to ascertain what they would like to stay away from in the event a subject might be too difficult to talk about.

In addition, the impression may have been created that I personally interviewed thousands of people on behalf of the Shoah Foundation. But, of course, I was only part of the organization that did so.

After-Shabbat seating

Leila Speisman's article on kosher restaurants raises many questions ("After-Shabbat eating ban hits eateries," CJN, Aug. 28). A kosher business has many restrictions as it is, but to be told when it can seat people and when it must close so that it doesn't lose its kashrut certificate is appalling.

Where are the parents of these "frum" teens who are socializing at these pizza places? If they are "frum," how come they reached their teenage years without knowing that their stream of religious Judaism forbids co-ed interaction? What kind of education did these teens receive? Why aren't the rabbis who are threatening the restaurant owners providing venues for these teens where they can socialize, even separately? And as for the drugs, who are the buyers and who are the sellers? Why doesn't the local community chip in and hire security and work with the police to clean up the area? It seems to me, and I don't know the owners nor have I been into their restaurants, that they are truly the only victims in this mess. Where is personal responsibility? For shame.

Egypt's hypocrisy

After a Hamas suicide bomber left 22 Israelis dead on a Jerusalem bus and maimed dozens of others Aug. 19, Egypt sent an envoy to the Israeli government and to the Palestinian Authority (PA) in an effort to keep the road map peace plan intact. The PA then said it would take steps to block the smuggling of arms into Gaza through tunnels from Egypt. The simple question is: why had the Egyptians not sealed the tunnels on their side of the border? Egypt pays lip service to peace while at the same time supplying munitions to the terrorist groups that operate freely in Gaza and the West Bank. This is the same hypocrisy exhibited by the government of Saudi Arabia, which, while maintaining its friendship with the United States, finances terrorist organizations throughout the world and turns a blind eye to the teaching of hatred toward the United States and Israel in its schools and mosques.

Is it any wonder that both Israel and the United States are left to their own devices to eliminate the scourge of terrorism?

A decade after Oslo, Israel and Palestinians face a changed world

By LESLIE SUSSER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

On the face of it, the Oslo peace process failed to achieve a great deal. Ten years after Israelis and Palestinians astounded the world by signing the accords, the two sides are again locked in armed struggle and are raising basic questions about legitimacy and recognition. In terms of conflict resolution, the parties seem to have stumbled back to a pre-Oslo square one.

But the situation today is, in fact, very different than it was a decade ago. Major political and geopolitical changes in the 10 years since Oslo, and the Oslo process itself, have coloured political thinking on both sides.

In Israel, taboos like the concept of a Palestinian state have been irrevocably smashed, while on the Palestinian side there is deeper questioning of the efficacy of the terrorist weapon.

> The dynamics of Oslo clarified for many Israelis the advantages of a two-state solution and the demographic dangers inherent in the present status quo

Perhaps most significantly, profound regional and international developments seem to be playing out in Israel's favour.

In Israel, the vagaries of the Oslo process changed political thinking on the right and the left. The peace process undercut the right's dream of a "greater Israel," while the collapse of the process shattered the left's dream of an idyllic, two-state solution in a "new Middle East."

Before Oslo, the thought of a Likud prime minister agreeing to the establishment of a Palestinian state would have been inconceivable. Indeed, when Oslo was signed, Labor party leaders Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres were careful not to commit themselves to Palestinian statehood for fear of sparking a public outcry.

Now, 10 years later, more than 60 per cent of Israelis – including Likud Prime Minister Ariel Sharon – back the two-state solution.

The failure of the parties to see the Oslo process through led to two significant conclusions on the Israeli side: If there are new agreements, there must be scrupulous third-party monitoring to ensure implementation; but if, ultimately, there is no credible peace partner, Israel should consider unilateral separation from the Palestinians.

President Clinton brings Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat together for a historic handshake after the signing of the Israeli-PLO peace accord at the White House Sept. 13, 1993. [RNS/Reuters photo]

The recent peace plan known as the road map provides the third-party supervision the Oslo process lacked. If it, too, fails to gather momentum, calls for unilateral separation will grow in Israel.

The dynamics of Oslo clarified for many Israelis the advantages of a two-state solution and the demographic dangers inherent in the present status quo. Even erstwhile right-wingers, such as the former minister for strategic planning Dan Meridor, now make the classic Labor argument that if it wishes to remain a Jewish and democratic state, Israel must separate politically from the Palestinians before they become a majority between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea.

Though Sharon does not use the demographic terminology, clearly it's in the back of his mind when he says that Israel should not rule over three million Palestinians and he calls for an end to "occupation."

On the Palestinian side, two contradictory post-Oslo strategies emerged that might be used: force Israeli concessions through terror, or abstain from terror and turn international sympathy into pressure on Israel.

Encouraged by the Israeli retreat from Lebanon in May 2000 and what he perceived as Saddam Hussein's growing power in Iraq, Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat opted for violence.

But his strategy imploded. No Arab states joined the struggle, the international community did not step in and Israel made no political concessions. On the contrary, the upshot was a discredited Arafat and a devastated Palestinian economy.

Moreover, after Al-Qaeda's Sept. 11 attacks in the United States, Palestinian terrorism became associated with international terrorism, and Israel was allowed unprecedented freedom of action against the terrorists. Sharon was able to reoccupy Palestinian cities and to embark on a policy of liquidating Hamas terrorist leaders – and there was little international protest.

Mahmoud Abbas, who became PA prime minister in April, led the post-Oslo policy alternative, denouncing Arafat's "militarization" of the intifadah as a huge strategic mistake that played into Israel's hands. Instead, Abbas advocated a strategy of dialogue based on the road map, combined with American pressure on Israel.

Regional developments since Oslo have further weakened the Palestinian position. Most significantly, the threat of a powerful "eastern front" against Israel – made up of Iraq, Syria and Jordan – collapsed. In 1994, a year after Oslo, Jordan made peace with Israel, while Saddam Hussein's ouster in April removed Iraq and left Syria isolated, surrounded by American or pro-American forces in Iraq, Turkey, Jordan and Israel.

Other developments also worked in Israel's favour. Israel's close relationship with Turkey, developed in the wake of the Oslo process, has survived the intifadah; U.S. control of Iraqi oil means a significant decline in the weight of the Arab oil card; and the weakness of the Arab League reflects a decline in the sense of a collective Arab identity.

For the Palestinians, these factors add up to a loss of their "Arab hinterland" and a growing sense of isolation.

Indeed, the Palestinians have had to turn to Iran for arms and financial aid. In January 2002, the Karine A, a ship carrying arms from Iran to the PA, was intercepted by Israel. Today, according to Israeli intelligence sources, Iranian Revolutionary Guards based in Lebanon are transferring arms and funds to Hamas.

Ironically, a decade after Oslo, a non-Arab country – Iran – poses the most serious strategic threat to Israel, promoting Palestinian terror and developing nuclear and other non-conventional weapons with missiles capable of reaching Israel.

For Israel, the American war in Iraq has a crucial bearing. If, over time, the Americans are seen to have won, it will be a major blow to all radical forces in the Middle East. But if they lose, Israel could find itself confronting buoyant radicals from all over the region.

Either way, one thing is certain: Israel's strategic alliance with the United States has become much stronger in the wake of Oslo – a process in which, initially, the Americans were not even involved.

On forgiveness

As we approach the High Holy Days, we are supposed to be preoccupied with notions of forgiveness, of asking for absolution, of clearing our record. It is a difficult season, one made more so by the Sept. 11 facts of human sin and evil. How are we supposed to forgive? How can we beg for absolution? Is amnesty really desirable? Can we be truly forgiven?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

The month before Rosh Hashanah is awesome, literally. We are to face God with awe and trembling, own up to our own failings and pledge improvement. The notion that we are given this chance annually, the recognition that we are all in need of this opportunity, and the implied acceptance of human fallibility and potential, mark these days with greatness and splendour.

But it is not an easy task. Few of us are capable of a full self assessment, one that is brutally honest and sincere.

Yet that is perhaps not the most difficult requirement of this forgiveness process. Judaism makes a more direct claim on us: we are expected to ask people – friends, family, and foe – to forgive us. Before we can face divine judgment, we require human pardon. Before we face God, we must face each other. Calling people to say "I'm sorry" is embarrassing and disconcerting just when we seek comfort in family rapport and community harmony. It means swallowing pride and resentment. It takes courage and humility.

But, again, that is not the most formidable of our season's demands. I think the most difficult task facing us is the charge to forgive. Just as we ask God to pardon us, we must try to forgive. And here I must confess, I fail. Over the years, I have managed to forgive individuals who harmed or hurt me. Misrepresentations about my character or my work on gender and Judaism, some of which were repeated many years ago in this newspaper, took a long time, but eventually I forgave those who made them. Thus, insults to my person I have struggled with and forgiven.

But I cannot excuse those who harm my family. How can I forgive those who hurt, demean, disrespect or lie about members of my family? I promised to love, protect and respect my husband and children. Forgiving those who violate their integrity is a violation of my own sense of being. I do not think I can even try. If this is a failing, I am sorry.

Forgiving those who damage my larger family, my people, falls into the same category. Forgiving those who maliciously destroy human life is impossible. Forgiving those who murder children in Israel is unconscionable. Amnesty is too perverse.

In this season of confessions, I confess, and I do not know what to do about it. But I cannot forgive.

A campaign of hope, not fear

Vancouver's 2004 Combined Jewish Appeal campaign is underway. Our centres sport banners. Signs bloom on the lawns of our agencies. Pictures, brochures, and online messages from campaign chairs abound. Special events and speakers fill our calendars.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

What's the message? That Jewish life is woe and trouble, that we face worse-than-ever threats to Israel and imminent cross-burnings on our nice suburban lawns. Is this the reality of Jewish life? Is this what we must sell to raise money?

What I am about to say is not a criticism of the volunteers who strive to raise money for Israel, overseas and local needs. I don't want to downplay the tzedakah needs of these three centres of Jewish life. But aren't we forgetting some basic marketing strategies?

What do we see in TV commercials? We see happy people enjoying the latest widget. Beautiful girls, plenty of beefcake. Even happy cats and dogs!

Consider the theme of our campaign: "What will tomorrow hold if we don't act today?" The answer: trouble and woe.

Headlines speak of a Jewish world in crisis, of millions facing virulent anti-Israel and anti-Semitic sentiment, of physical threats to personal security, of a devastated Israeli economy, of a world where there is no guarantee our children will live in a secure environment, and of the continued erosion of Jewish identity due to assimilation.

I can't forget that Israelis are dying from terror bombings and snipers, and I am not downplaying European and media anti-Semitism. Nor do I deny that Canada's Jewish poverty rate hovers around 20 per cent, or that Argentine Jews face a very nasty local situation.

But, as many Jewish groups in Vancouver did recently, I would rather celebrate a Day of Unity with our local kollel and enjoy "A Fair to Remember" as the opening to our campaign than be told that only through disaster will we become a stronger people. So if, as one campaign leader says, this isn't your mother and father's campaign any more, why don't we see more celebration and less hand-wringing?

We in North America live in the wealthiest, most secure Jewish community in the history of our people. I include the years when we had our own kingdoms, maintained in almost constant states of warfare (including civil wars), that finally disappeared in flames.

Just over 50 years ago, our community was in tatters, as gaunt Holocaust survivors emerged from concentration camps. Now, those same survivors are the backbone of our communities, and we have a Jewish state that maintains its strength and independence.

Fifty years ago, the number of day schools in North America was minuscule, and they usually catered to the ultra-religious. Today, thousands flourish for all denominations. Fifty years ago, few men wore kippot on the street. Now, no one gives it much thought. Fifty years ago, Canadian Jews were begging the government to let in a few Holocaust survivors. Now, we bring Jewish immigrants in freely. Fifty years ago, there were Jewish quotas in universities. Now, few would deny us access to education and jobs. Fifty years ago, Israel struggled against Arab armies and daily attacks. Today, terror attacks do cause terrible heartache and destruction, but Israel now has an army that is second to none and the support of the most powerful nation on earth.

Our experiences and those of our children have been very different than those of previous generations. We can make a difference to poverty levels here and abroad, build our local institutions and help Jews in distress, because we have been blessed.

That's the good news, and we should capitalize on it. Let us remember that the Rambam did not put guilt and ill grace at the top of his ladder of charity, but pretty far down.

We cannot make Judaism attractive to the youth if all we offer them is pain.

"We will not be driven by fear into an age of unreason if we… remember that we are not descended from fearful men," said CBS journalist Edward R. Murrow in a report on U.S. Senator Joe McCarthy in March 1954.

We are not descended from fearful people. Nor should we pretend to be afraid. We have to remember that hope trumps sorrow, and that belief in ourselves trumps fear. Let's celebrate who we are and what we can give. That should open our hearts to the mitzvah of tzedakah that we are commanded to perform.

Weighing for forgiveness

With Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur around the corner, I find myself pondering my personal successes and shortcomings during the year that's about to end. And, like many other people, I start drafting resolutions for the new year.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

Once again, losing weight is near the top of my list. Every Rosh Hashanah since around 5741, I have been resolving to drop a pile of pounds. And each year, immediately after a 4,500-calorie erev Rosh Hashanah dinner, I remind myself that this is the time of year to seek forgiveness and commit to change.

About 22 hours later, while consuming a 4,700-calorie first-day Rosh Hashanah lunch, I insist this year will be different, the year I finally make serious, sustainable progress toward healthy weight loss. A day later, I re-affirm that commitment between bites of a 5,000-calorie, second-day Rosh Hashanah lunch.

The first few days after Rosh Hashanah are always easy. My commitment is strong, I'm optimistic, and I feel like I won't be hungry until at least Pesach. By the time Yom Kippur rolls around, I'm feeling pretty proud of my restraint. Except for a caffeine-withdrawal headache, the fast is always a breeze. I tend to eat too much when it's time to break the fast, but who doesn't?

And then trouble begins. As the weather gets colder, it becomes harder to motivate myself to get to the gym at the JCC. When I do, I find I'm more eager to chat than to lift heavy objects or shvitz through my shirt while pedalling on a bike that doesn't take me anywhere. My vocal chords get a better workout than the rest of me. Accordingly, my winter metabolism remains as productive as the Hamilton Tiger-Cats.

As the year drags on, my willingness to go work out ebbs and flows. But I'm always willing to go on a goofy diet. In anticipation of an out-of-town wedding on the Labour Day weekend, I decided to go on the "Cabbage Soup Diet," a one-week program useful for kick-starting a healthy eating program or for shaking off the final few stubborn pounds after a normal diet. In seven days, I lost 12 pounds – and about seven of those came in the first $2\frac{1}{2}$ days. The diet calls for you to consume a lot of cabbage soup and specific foods on each of the diet days. At first, the soup wasn't too bad. But by the ninth bowl of that heinous swill, I was ready to send hate mail to cabbage farmers.

I've also been on the "Carbohydrate Addict's Diet," a bizarre program that allowed me to eat carbohydrates once a day for a period of time not to exceed an hour. In that hour (playfully dubbed "The Gorge Hour" by a friend who has spent a few carb times with me), I could eat whatever I wanted and as much as I wanted. But no carbs for the rest of the day. It felt like a strange way to eat, but I did lose about two pounds a week for three months. I stopped the diet because I started to slip.

I've done hypnosis by tape and with a therapist. I've been to nutritionists. And I've been through Weight Watchers twice. (Their crazy little scheme is to infuse customers with the curious notion that you can lose weight by eating less and exercising more. Odd, but effective.)

Each diet or program I try starts and ends the same way – and it's the same for many weight-challenged people. We start with enthusiasm, and we're rewarded with some success. Then, we drift back into lousy habits and tighter clothes.

During the Yom Kippur confessional, we ask for forgiveness for the sins we have committed with food and drink. I will ask again for that forgiveness, and I will forgive myself, too, for not succeeding this past year. But then it's back to the gym and some healthy habits.

Maybe this time my healthy eating will last until next Rosh Hashanah, when I can regain any weight I've lost in only three holiday meals. Shanah Tovah.

The Kirshner File

The battle against Al Qaeda is far from over

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The Islamic fundamentalist group synonymous with international terrorism and the destruction of the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, 2001 is down but not out.

Two years to the day since 19 Arab hijackers wreaked havoc in the United States and left the world reeling in shock and anguish, Al Qaeda is weaker, yet it is still very much of a threat to the West and its allies.

Since that black day, Al Qaeda has carried out a series of audacious attacks. And in the past year, Al Qaeda and its affiliates have bombed soft targets in Kenya, Indonesia, Saudi Arabia and Morocco.

In response to the Sept. 11 attacks, which claimed the lives of almost 3,000 civilians, the United States invaded Afghanistan. American power shattered Al Qaeda's base there and unseated the Islamist Taliban regime, which had provided ideological and logistical support to Al Qaeda and its founder, Osama bin Laden.

The United States then launched a concerted campaign to track down Al Qaeda's leadership. Its top two leaders, bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahiri, remain at large, but some of their lieutenants have been caught.

A year ago, U.S. and Pakistani forces captured Ramzi bin al-Shibh – a high-ranking Al Qaeda operative – in Karachi. And in an Israeli-style targeted killing shortly afterward, the United States assassinated a senior Al Qaeda leader in Yemen.

On the heels of this operation, Abd al-Rahim al-Nashiri was arrested. He was allegedly one of the planners of the 1998 U.S. embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania and the attack on the U.S.S. Cole in 2000.

Six months ago, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed – bin Laden's chief of operations and the man who allegedly supervised the assault on a Tunisian synagogue in April 2002 that killed 21 people – was captured in Rawalpindi, Pakistan. Walid Ba'Attash, who is said to have played major roles in the Sept. 11 attacks and the bombing of the U.S.S. Cole, was subsequently arrested in Karachi.

Riduan Isamuddin, an important terrorist, was apprehended in Thailand in August. Better known as Hambali, he was the mastermind of the October 2002 bombing in Bali, Indonesia, that killed 202 people, primarily Australian tourists.

In another important development, Richard Reid, a British convert to Islam and an Al Qaeda acolyte who tried to blow up an American Airlines flight with explosives concealed in his sneakers, was sentenced to life imprisonment by a judge in Boston. And in Hamburg, a panel of seven German judges imposed a 15 year sentence on Mounir el-Motassadeq, a Sept. 11 plotter.

Last month, after Kenya rounded up five suspects linked to the November 2002 Al Qaeda attack in Mombasa in which three Israelis were killed, a court in Indonesia condemned to death a garage mechanic, known as Amrozi, for his involvement in the Bali atrocity. He was a member of Jemaah Islamiya, an organization affiliated with Al Qaeda. At around the same time, a court in Morocco sentenced to death four Islamists charged with a wave of suicide attacks in Casablanca last spring.

Despite these setbacks, Al Qaeda remains a lethal organization. It has regrouped and tried to develop a new generation of harder-to-detect explosives, and it has begun a new recruitment drive aimed at bolstering its membership.

By all accounts, the U.S. invasion of Iraq last March has fanned the embers of Islamic radicalism, probably the most dangerous political phenomenon of our times. More important, Al Qaeda, with help from local sympathizers, has resumed terrorist operations.

Within a four-day period in May, suicide bombers struck Saudi Arabia – the home of 15 of the 19 Sept. 11 hijackers – and Morocco. In Riyadh, they targeted three foreign residential compounds, killing 25 civilians. In Casablanca, Morocco's commercial hub, 14 bombers attacked five sites, including a Jewish community centre, and killed 28 bystanders. The assailants belonged to Salafia Jihadia, which is close to Al Qaeda.

There were additional incidents in August.

Jemaah Islamiya bombed the five-star Marriott Hotel in Jakarta, Indonesia's capital, killing 16 people. And in Baghdad, 17 civilians were killed when a car bomb ripped through Jordan's embassy. U.S. officials in Iraq pointed a finger of blame at Ansar al-Islam, which is associated with Al Qaeda. Yet no compelling evidence has emerged to link the old Iraqi regime to Al Qaeda.

During the war in Iraq, U.S. forces wiped out Ansar al-Islam's camps in northeastern Iraq, near the Iranian border. But in the last few months, Ansar al-Islam has reconstituted itself and its surviving members have filtered back into Iraq from Iran.

According to reports, the third-ranking member of Al Qaeda, Saif al-Adel, has found refuge in Iran and is now in Iran's custody. A former Egyptian army officer, he is wanted by the United States in connection with the bombings in Kenya and Tanzania. Saudi authorities claim that he orchestrated the bombings in Riyadh in May. Washington has asked for his extradition, but Iran has refused.

Despite its successes in capturing Al Qaeda operatives, the United States is still vulnerable to mega-terrorism.

The London-based World Markets Research Centre claims that the United States is "the number one target for many terrorist groups," and that "another Sept. 11 style attack in the United States is very likely."

And in a sombre aside, World Markets Research Centre notes the American invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq have exacerbated anti-American feelings in the Muslim world.

Ayman al-Zawahiri

Bin Laden and al-Zawahiri have, of course, exploited these fears. In a recorded message last February, bin Laden urged his followers to strike the United States by all means, including suicide bombings. And in August, al-Zawahiri spoke of imminent assaults against the United States.

The Bush administration regards these warnings with the utmost seriousness.

"The potential for us to be hit again is very real," John Ashcroft, the U.S. attorney-general, said after the al-Zawahiri recording. In tandem with Ashcroft's warning, U.S. President George W. Bush has talked about a "real threat" from Al Qaeda to hijack and/or bomb passenger planes.

Contemplating such possibilities, the United States recently dispatched teams of aviation safety investigators to Europe, Asia and the Middle East to determine whether airports there can be defended against terrorists. Washington fears that terrorists, using shoulder-fired missiles, may attempt to shoot down airliners. It is not an idle fear. Last month, three Americans, including an elderly person of Jewish ancestry, were arrested in a plot to supply Russian missiles to terrorists.

U.S. law enforcement officials earlier announced they had uncovered an Al Qaeda scheme to bring down the Brooklyn Bridge.

Keenly aware of the clear and present danger posed by terrorists, the United States has also sent inspectors to major seaports in Muslim nations. Their mission is to prevent terrorists from using cargo containers to smuggle chemical, biological and nuclear weapons into the United States.

Despite the United States' success in pulverizing Al Qaeda's operational base in Afghanistan, the process of putting that country back together again has only just begun.

The pro-Western government of President Hamid Karzai has little authority, being in control of only Kabul, the capital city, and its surrounding areas. Warlords, many of whom are tacitly supported by the United States, reign supreme outside Kabul.

Security in the rest of this perennially unstable nation, particularly in the south and in the east, is at best tenuous. Lately, Al Qaeda and the Taliban have grown bolder, mounting attacks on the reconstituted Afghan army, ordinary civilians, aid workers, government officials and the foreign troops that patrol Afghanistan. The United States maintains a garrison of 8,000 soldiers, while the International Security and Assistance Force, under the command of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, has 5,000 troops, including 1,900 Canadians.

Due to the chaos still roiling this impoverished country, basic services are in short supply, reconstruction projects are at a virtual standstill and efforts to draft a new constitution have bogged down.

Beyond Afghanistan, there are problems in Indonesia and the southern Philippines, which have become training grounds for Jemaah Islamiya. Saudi Arabia, which has long tolerated Islamic radicalism, has belatedly started to hunt down Al Qaeda sympathizers.

In Iraq, where the American army is engaged in an increasingly bitter guerrilla war with Saddam Hussein loyalists and Islamic radicals, the United States describes its struggle there to win the peace as "the central battle in the war on terrorism."

Al Qaeda is weaker today than it was before the war in Afghanistan. But this resilient terrorist organization and its affiliates are still capable of baring their fangs and causing tremendous damage.

Israel launches campaign to boost tourism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Pledge cards to be distributed during High Holy Days in synagogues

Israel's Ministry of Tourism is launching a High Holy Day campaign to convince synagogue-goers in North America to visit Israel in the upcoming year.

Worshippers across Canada can expect to find a pledge card on their seats during Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur with four tabs they can fold to indicate whether they plan to travel in the next three, six, nine or 12 months.

By filling out the card and sending it to the Israel Government Tourism Office (IGTO) office in Toronto, participants can request information on trips, tour operators, missions and other data that might be useful in planning their trips, said Samara Bordan, manager of marketing and public relations for the IGTO. "It will create an open dialogue with Canadian Jews."

The Project Go Israel campaign is the brainchild of Israeli Tourism Minister Benny Elon, who has set a goal of hosting 1.2 million visitors to Israel in the coming year (September 2003 to September 2004). That would mark a substantial increase in traffic to Israel over 2002, when only 800,000 travellers visited the Jewish state.

"The best way we can access North American Jews is through the synagogue," Elon said.

"This tourism pledge project represents an extremely significant commitment by Canadians who take part," added Dan Shahal, Israel's consul for tourism in Canada.

Tourism in Israel and the broader hospitality industry has taken a severe financial hit thanks to the Palestinian intifadah, as visitors stayed away from Israel in increasing numbers. However, in recent months the statistics appear to be shifting, suggesting the downward trend that dates back to October 2000 may be reversing.

In July 2003, 113,000 tourists entered Israel, up 54 per cent over the same period the year before and slightly greater than July 2001.

Press reports indicated the numbers of incoming tourists in April, May and June were also up, by 17 per cent, 36 per cent and 44 per cent respectively over the same months the year before. As many as 519,900 tourists entered Israel in the first seven months of 2003, a 10 per cent increase over the same period last year.

The Canadian figures are also strong, Bordan said. Flights to Israel over the summer have been full while a number of organization missions have attracted capacity crowds. Close to 1,600 young adults visited Israel as part of the Birthright program – another strong indication interest in the Jewish state is perking up – while in May, 2,956 Canadians visited Israel, up from only 1,973 in May 2002, she said.

"We're building on that momentum, to get people to commit to visiting Israel," Bordan said. "There is no fundraising. It's just asking people to commit to go to Israel and to name a time frame."

By bringing Israel visits to the forefront during the holiday season and offering ways of helping people plan their trips, Jewish Canadians will be enticed into visiting, she added.

A grass roots group of volunteers is being organized to contact the dozens of synagogues that will be asked to participate. These volunteers, co-ordinated by Anne Maurer, will serve as liaison between the IGTO and local communities, Bordan said.

Chabad Lubavitch sets up Mississauga outpost

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A townhouse in the Erin Mills section of Mississauga will be the nucleus of an effort to bring awareness of their roots to the Jews of Mississauga.

Rabbi Yitzchok Slavin, 27, his wife Sara, a teacher, and their one-year-old son, Yehoshua, moved to Erin Mills last month, hoping to establish a Jewish presence there.

This, said Rabbi Slavin, is in accord with the wishes of the late Lubavitcher rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, "to bring Yiddishkeit to every single Jew," regardless of his or her background, level of observance or knowledge.

Rabbi Slavin is well-equipped for the task. After attending yeshiva high schools in Paris and New York, he worked as an exchange student in Sydney, Australia, for a year, providing adult education and doing children's programming. He then returned home to get his smichah from the Rabbinical College in the Crown Heights section of Brooklyn, N.Y.

He said that he was already familiar with Toronto, because his sister, Dvora Deitsch, is rebbitzen of Chabad Downtown on Bathurst Street, south of St. Clair Avenue.

"There were a lot of phone calls [to Lubavitch headquarters in Thornhill], asking why there is no Chabad centre in Mississauga. Now there will be," Rabbi Slavin said.

He said he has found people very excited about Chabad coming to Mississauga. "They feel it will be a boost for the Jewish community."

He said he and his wife are looking to fill any void they find, especially educationally.

"We want to teach Torah in an exciting way, showing children, and adults, that the Torah life is exciting."

He said they plan to offer day and evening classes for adults, conduct office visits and "lunch-and-learn" classes, and hold classes for children.

They also plan to expose kids to a shofar factory, a matzah bakery and how to make oil on Chanukah.

"It's real hands-on education," he said.

Erindale College, a college of the University of Toronto, is nearby, and Rabbi Slavin said he hopes to seek out Jewish students who study there or live on campus, as well as professors or other staff "regardless of their affiliation."

As well, he said, he plans to visit hospitals, to bring such things as shofars, lulavs and etrogs, and chanukiyot to Jewish patients.

Rabbi Slavin said he plans to eventually branch out to Oakville and Halton Region. As well, he has been in contact with Rabbi Lawrence Englander of the Reform congregation Solel, who, he said, is very open to the idea of some co-operative programming.

While there is some kosher food available at major supermarkets in Erin Mills, Rabbi Slavin hopes to encourage them to bring more out. "Now, Jews mainly have to go to Toronto."

Rabbi Slavin said he believes that showing Jews the beauty of Yiddishkeit in an exciting and meaningful way will help curb the increasing rate of assimilation.

For more information on Chabad in Mississauga, contact Rabbi Slavin at 905-820-4432.

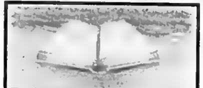
Jewish Life

Some thoughts about 9/11

By RABBI AVRAHAM PLOTKIN



Rabbinic Reflections

A rabbi dies and is waiting in line at the gates of Heaven. Ahead of him is a fellow dressed in sunglasses, a loud shirt, a leather jacket and jeans.

The angel addresses the fellow. "Who are you, so that I may know whether or not to admit you to Heaven?"

He replies, "I'm Joe Cohen, taxi driver, of Noo Yawk City."

The angel consults his list. He smiles and says to the taxi driver, "Take this silken robe and golden staff and enter Heaven."

The taxi driver goes into Heaven with his robe and staff. Now it's the rabbi's turn. He stands erect and booms out, "I am Joseph Snow, rabbi of Congregation Ahavat Shalom for the last 43 years."

The angel consults his list. He says to the rabbi, "Take this cotton robe and wooden staff and enter Heaven."

"Just a minute," says the rabbi. "That man was a taxi driver and he gets a silken robe and golden staff. How can this be?"

"Up here, we work by results," says the angel. "While you preached, people slept. While he drove, people prayed."

This story rings true. We are motivated by the world's "taxi drivers" far more than by the rabbis. It seems the human psyche is primarily motivated by fear rather than love. Yet fear is limited and short-term. Love is far more effective and permanent.

On the second anniversary of 9/11, we are reminded of an event of historic proportions that, we are told, changed the world forever. While we saw humanity at its worst, we also saw humanity at its best.

Yet only two years later, all that positive energy seems to have faded and we have returned to our old ways and habits. Why does an event like 9/11 have such a short-term effect? Do we really have such a short memory?

The answer is that 9/11 was about fear and terror. Yes, fear is an effective motivator, but it's also highly flawed, an external force that, like the taxi driver, gets everyone praying fervently, but only until the end of the ride. When the passenger steps out of the taxi, the praying is over.

The most apocalyptic and catastrophic Torah warning is described graphically in this week's reading. The Torah clearly states its root cause: "Because you failed to worship me with joy." The cause of these horrific prognostications is not just simply failure to act according to the Torah, but a failure to maintain a positive attitude. Worship must be accompanied by joy and love.

The shortcomings of fear as our primary motivator are evident in some of the most important areas of Jewish life today:

- Education: The old approach of the cheder rabbi tugging at his student's ear for discipline doesn't cut it anymore. The many cheder dropouts over the years have proven its ineffectiveness. Education must be imparted through love and joy for it to succeed.
- Outreach: In the last 30 years, there has been an explosion of outreach groups and approaches. Time has shown that those with a joyful, loving approach to Torah and HaShem are far more effective than fear-mongers.
- Continuity: It has been proven time and again that warning our children about the tragedy of intermarriage and the evils of anti-Semitism is not enough to get them to care about perpetuating Judaism into the next generation. Children need to be given positive and meaningful reasons for being Jewish.
- Israel: Terror attacks should not be the primary trigger for activism and prayers for Israel. We should be thinking about Israel 24/7, even when there is no terror. It's clear why our fear-based connection has dominated recently. Every time we hear about a tragic bombing, our hearts go out to the victims and their families. Yet our relationship to Israel is surely much more than fear-based. Israel is not just the result of thousands of years of Jewish fear and suffering. It is the land we love, given to us by God, whose destiny is intertwined with our own.

One day soon, love and joy will replace fear as the primary motivation of our faith, please God. At that point, there will be no one to fear, people will have a strong knowledge of God, and of course, the rabbis will regain from the taxi drivers their rightful place in Heaven.

A truly historic lawsuit

By RABBI AVI SHAFRAN
Special to The CJN

The loud chortling sound you may have heard last week was the collective mirth of countless Talmud-conversant Jews as they read about a lawsuit being prepared by a group of Egyptian expatriates in Switzerland.

The news came in the form of an interview, published in the Egyptian weekly Al-Ahram Al-Arabi, with Nabil Hilmi, dean of the faculty of law at the University of Al-Zaqaziq. The article was translated and made available by the invaluable Middle East Media Research Institute (MEMRI).

Hilmi's lawsuit is ostensibly being filed against "all the Jews of the world" to recover property allegedly stolen during the Exodus of the Jews from Egypt 3,300 years ago.

Citing the Torah, Hilmi is demanding, presumably on Egypt's behalf, the return of "gold, jewelry, cooking utensils, silver ornaments, clothing and more," not to mention interest thereon, taken by the ancestors of today's Jews "in the middle of the night" – a "clear theft of a host country's resources and treasure, something that fits the morals and character of the Jews."

According to Hilmi's computations, which include an annual doubling in value of the material in question, 1,125 trillion tons of gold are owed by the Jews for each of the 300 tons he estimates was taken. And that doesn't include interest, which he claims, without explanation, should be calculated for 5758 years.

The merriment that greeted the report was born of the fact the Talmud tells of precisely such a claim lodged more than 2,000 years ago in a world court of sorts presided over by none other than Alexander the Great.

The story is recounted in Sanhedrin 91a, where one Geviha ben Pesisa responded on the Jews' behalf. A paraphrase of the excerpt follows: "What is your source ?" Geviha asked the Egyptian representatives. "The Torah," they replied.

"Very well," said Geviha, "I too will invoke the Torah, which says that the Jews spent 430 years laboring in Egypt. Please compensate us for 600,000 men's work for that period of time."

The Egyptians, the Talmud continues, then asked Alexander for three days during which to formulate a response. The recess was granted but the representatives, finding no counter-argument, never returned.

One supposes that Hilmi was unfamiliar with that page of Talmud, and perhaps with the underlying biblical narrative on which it is based.

His gift to us, though, is more than a good laugh. For by sending us to Sanhedrin 91a, he provides us great consolation and hope in these trying times. The very next account on that page concerns yet another historic lawsuit – ancient and yet as timely as tomorrow's headlines.

This suit was filed by "the children of Ishmael and Keturah [Abraham's second wife, identified by the Midrash as Hagar]." Ishmael, of course, is claimed by many Arabs as their ancestor.

The plaintiffs in this suit claimed that Canaan, or the Land of Israel, was really theirs, as the Torah identifies their antecedents, no less than Isaac, to be progeny of Abraham.

Once again, Geviha responded on behalf of the Jews. "Your source?" he asked. "The Torah," they responded. "If so," he continued, "I too will invoke the Torah, which says that Abraham gave 'all that was his to Isaac; and to the children of his concubines [other wives], he gave [only] gifts, and he sent them away from Isaac his son… eastward.'"

Intriguingly, the Talmud mentions no Ishmaelite or Keturite reaction in Alexander's court – not even a request for time to formulate a response. It's almost as if those plaintiffs simply refused to acknowledge the unarguable case that had been presented, as if they were utterly unable to countenance the idea that the Holy Land was in fact bequeathed in its entirety by Abraham to Isaac, who in turn bequeathed it to Jacob, and he, to his children after him, the Jewish people.

According to the Jewish religious tradition, though, the entire world, including Ishmael's descendants, will one day come not only to countenance the idea but to fully embrace it. That day has not yet arrived, to be sure, and it will not be military or political actions in the end that will bring it, but rather our merits as a people.

It will arrive, though. As the prophet Jeremiah tells our Rachel, one of the mothers of the Jewish people: "Restrain your voice from crying and tears from your eyes… for there is hope for you in the end… the children will return to their borders."

Rabbi Shafran is director of public affairs for Agudath Israel of America.

Jewish Life

A clever composite of gifted writers

Ziff: A Life?* by Alan Lelchuk, Carrol & Graf, $40.95.

This novel tells the story of Danny Levitan, a once respected novelist, but now half forgotten, who is startled when he receives a publisher's offer to write a biography of Arthur Ziff, his good friend and mentor, the enfant terrible of American letters.

Books

Bernard Baskin

Levitan is uncertain. The highly successful and talented Ziff, author of such satiric classics as The Carnal Confessions of Rabbi Shmuel Siegal and The Savage Yid, has incurred the enmity of the Jewish community. Moreover, a concerned Ziff refuses to co-operate in the project and threatens to sue if the book contains false or unproved information.

After much soul searching, Danny undertakes the task and travels to Europe to unearth information about his elusive subject, and to interview a number of his former friends and lovers. Ziff turns out to be a far more complex character than expected. Yes, he was unrelenting in his exposure of the frailties and shortcomings of the Jewish community. Yes, he was a hedonist and womanizer, leaving a trail of broken vows and hearts in his wake. But, as Danny discovers to his surprise, Ziff has secretly helped Jewish and non-Jewish writers in Europe and is writing a positive novel on Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat who saved thousands of Hungarian Jews during the Holocaust.

Trying to confirm information about Ziff's rumoured affair with a famous gentile actress, Danny breaks into his friend's writing studio. There he discovers a concealed memoir of Ziff's secret affair with the daughter of a liberal rabbi, a senior at Brandeis University.

The romance doesn't blossom, but Ziff finds new meaning in Judaism.

"I felt free, for the first time, to pursue real ideas in Judaism, and to witness authentic ways, in being close to Charna," he writes. "I learned for the first time the true meaning of Chassidism, its history of authentic rebellion by means of emotionalism and spontaneity against the armies of mainstream Judaism, rather than the corny weddings and costumes of the current ilk, or its materialistic modern appearance. And while I didn't convert in any outward or notable way, I came to discern and appreciate what Jewishness was about, in its better, pristine forms, not the current suburban bastardizations and euphemisms."

When Danny's biography appears, it is viciously attacked. A rabbi is outraged: "What you have written is a shanda, a complete shanda! How could you say this lifelong self-hating Jew would ever dream of helping his fellow Jews? Are you meshugah? Or simply a front man for this major anti-Semite? Or just a dangerous fool, an assimilated Jewgoy? I once had a conversation with the great I. B. Singer, and when Ziff's name came up, he shook his head in dismay and said, in America, a Jewish artist was no more than a common con artist, a merchant whose only Torah was the dollar bill! Do you think you know more than the great Jewish writer and chochom??"

Alan Lelchuk, who is a teacher and the author of American Mischief and Miriam at Thirty-Four, has written a brilliant novel. Ziff: A Life? is entertaining and clever, with unexpected twists of plot. Perhaps most important is the portrayal of Ziff as the composite of a number of gifted Jewish writers who were denounced by the Jewish community, but who felt they were being true to their own experiences. Ziff, who moves from literary rebel to become a more informed and positive Jew, is a literary example of recent young Jewish writers who have found rich, creative resources in their background and culture.

Celebrating Jewish birthdays

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In just a few short weeks, the Jewish world will be celebrating its 5,764th birthday. Judaism has a rich tradition of birthday celebrations, as we'll see courtesy of the World Wide Web.

The Jewish Highway

At first glance, it seems the Torah does not have a lot to say about birthdays. In their fascinating essay "Birthdays, Jewishly," Lisa Farber Miller and Sandra Widener quote the Encyclopedia Judaica: "The celebration of birthdays is unknown in traditional Jewish ritual." In fact, the encyclopedia says, the only birthday party mentioned in the Bible is for Pharaoh! (Genesis 40:20) [http://www.ritualwell.org/Rituals/ritual.html?docid=936].

Rabbi Yanki Tauber says Judaism traditionally observes the death (yahrzeit) of an individual, while the anniversary of a birth does not get as much attention. This is logical, he says, since a yahrzeit commemorates a lifetime of achievement. But he then suggests that the birth of a child does merit celebrating in our tradition. "Birth marks the point at which your body received and fused with your soul, the point at which you attained your individuality" [http://www.chabad.org/magazine/article.asp?AID=58234].

The Ohr Somayach site mentions several sages who marked their birthdays as auspicious days. "Rabbi Yisrael Lifshitz instructed his children that when one of them has a birthday, the others should visit and bless him. Similarly, distinguished members of Jerusalem's Jewish community used to visit Rabbi Shmuel Salant on his birthday and offer him their blessings" [http://ohr.edu/ask_db/ask_main.php?id_number=222].

The Chabad site goes even further, suggesting that a Jewish birthday can be considered in some ways "a mini-Rosh Hashanah. The Talmud informs us that on our Jewish birthdays our mazel is dominant. The Jewish birthday is the perfect day for reflection about our lives as Jews and is an auspicious time to make new resolutions to perform good deeds and to deepen our commitment to Torah and the role it plays in our lives" [http://www.chabad.org/calendar/birthday. asp].

How can you help your child celebrate their birthday in a Jewish manner? In the "Birthdays, Jewishly" article, Widener and Miller have several suggestions: plan a Shabbat dinner, have a tzedakah party where kids are given extra money to put in a tzedakah box, or start a Saturday slumber party with a havdalah ceremony.

Have you lost track of your Jewish birthday? Don't worry, it's easy to figure out. Just go to the Jewish Birthday calculator and type in the English date and whether you born in the morning, evening or night [http://www.chabad.org/calendar/birthday.asp?AID=6228]. And if someone you know is about to celebrate a big day, you can e-mail them a free card with "Yom huledet samayach" greetings [http://www.yourpage.org/yom.html].

If you are marking a milestone birthday this year, you may want to check out the wisdom found in Avot 5:24 of Pirkei Avot, the Teachings of our Fathers:

"At five years old a person should study the Scriptures, at 10 years for the Mishnah, at 13 for the commandments,
at 15 for the Talmud,
at 18 for the bridechamber, at 20 for one's life pursuit,
at 30 for authority,
at 40 for discernment,
at 50 for counsel,
at 60 to be an elder,
at 70 for gray hairs,
at 80 for special strength."

I'll leave it to you to check out what it says about turning 90 and 100 [http://www.shechem.org/torah/avot.ht ml#chap5].

While we're on the topic of Jewish aging, one of the most famous blessings that Jews bestow on each other is "Bis hundert und tzvantzig" or "Ad may'yah v'esrim" – "Until 120." The age of 120 is considered an ideal age to die because Moses was 120 years old when he died (Deut. 34:7) [http://www.jewfaq.org/moshe.htm].

Rabbi Lewis John Eron, director of religious services at Jewish Geriatric Home in Cherry Hill, N.J. has a related story. One Shabbat morning, he announced that a resident of the home was celebrating a milestone birthday and he wished that she live to the age of 120 [http://www.jrf.org/recondt/vayelech_eron.html]. A friend of hers said, "No, rabbi, you should wish her 120 years and three months." "Why the extra three months?" the rabbi asked. "Rabbi," she declared, "Don't you want her to enjoy her party?"

New foundation seeks to protect victims of crime

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

When Lozanne and Joseph Wamback heard that Matti Baranovski had been killed in an attack in a Toronto park, they asked Matti's mother, Olga, if she needed help.

The Wambacks' son, Jonathan, was also the victim of a brutal attack. Last year, they founded the Canadian Crime Victims Foundation (CCVF), a registered charity that works to provide protection for victims of violent crime in Canada.

"We are bonded in tragedy," said Lozanne in a joint interview with Baranovski.

On Nov. 14, 1999, 15-year-old Matti Baranovski was beaten to death in G. Ross Lord Park by a group of teenagers looking for a pack of cigarettes. Meir Mariani and Lee Cochrane, both 20, were convicted of second-degree murder in the case earlier this summer. Daniel Weiz, 22, who had been accused with Mariani and Cochrane, was acquitted.

"My son Matti who was a victim, cannot have a voice," Baranovski said. "He was the witness to a crime but he cannot tell his story."

In her grief, Baranovski spoke of her disappointment with the Canadian justice system.

"I am grateful to a few people who listened to my broken heart – the Wambacks, Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, director of the Jewish Russian Community Centre, [Toronto city councillor] Mike Feldman, Judy Kennedy, Matti's principal at Northview High School and [Jewish Vocational Services volunteer] Goldie [Steiner] – but the system failed me.

"The courtroom procedures and rules are a game."

"Canadian crime victims are virtually ignored by the very nature of our criminal justice system and, for the most part, left to heal on their own," Lozanne said.

"The CCVF's mission is to empower and provide resources to victims of crime and affect positive change to victims' services in Canada. Our mission is to give victims a voice."

In June 1999, the Wambacks' son, Jonathan, then 15 years old, was beaten in a park near the Wambacks' home in Newmarket. Jonathan managed to escape his attackers, but five of them chased him in a car and trapped him between two houses, where they kicked him repeatedly in the skull. He was in a coma for three months and today has brain damage, walks with a limp and speaks with difficulty.

Joseph said in a separate interview that the foundation supports victims' families by providing them with psychological, emotional and financial support, as well as information about any service providers.

Unfortunately, he said, there are no such providers.

"When you're injured in a crime, there are no support services," he said. "There are no psychologists in Toronto that deal specifically with assaults on young men."

And, Joseph said, "You're encouraged not to talk to the press because it will jeopardize the case" – something he believes is "absolute nonsense.

"Canadians – from all areas – have to speak out" to change things, he said.

The Wamback court case took, with the appeals process, "about three, 3½ years," Joseph said. In that time, of the 14 boys who were involved in the attack, three were charged. Two were convicted of aggravated assault and one got off on a technicality. As well, two of the 14 boys, who were both 19 at the time of the attack – and, therefore, old enough to be charged as adults – were given immunity from prosecution for their testimony against the young offenders.

"[Canadian] society spends more energy and time defending the rights of criminals than on the rights of victims," Joseph said. "That's tyranny."

Fifty-one months since the assault, he said, "We have yet to be contacted by a single service provider." He and Lozanne applied for compensation in September 1999 with the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board (CICB), an agency of the provincial Ministry of the Attorney General, but withdrew their claim 42 months later without having received a response. They then filed a complaint with the provincial government and are still waiting for a response from the ombudsman.

Lozanne said through their case, she and her husband found "many flaws" in the new Youth Criminal Justice Act.

"There is no accountability and no consequences," she said. "We gathered a million signatures to stop the passage of the act," but it was implemented in April 2003.

Through their relationship with hundreds of other victims, including Baranovski – who "has not received a nickel" in compensation, Joseph said – the Wambacks learned that Canadian victims' services and victims' rights "are virtually nonexistent at best, and the systemic revictimization of Canadian crime victims remains unchecked and unaccountable," said Lozanne.

"The existing services for victims provides a lack of resources and mandate to provide the desperately needed services such as psychological counselling, medical intervention, financial assistance for funerals and lost wages, as well as court support and mediation, to name just a few," she said.

Joseph added that it's not simply about services, it's about approach. "Canada does not comply with the UN Convention on Justice Victims [1997] – and Canada is a signatory to that. The word 'victim' doesn't appear in the Charter of Rights," he said.

The Wambacks hope their foundation will "bring awareness and to promote the Canadian and United Nations statements and principles of justice for victims of crime," Lozanne said.

She said the CICB has $80 million "and we don't know of any victims or their families who are receiving any benefits."

The CICB declined to discuss the Wamback case for confidentiality reasons, but Steven Owen, executive assistant to CICB chair Marsha Greenfield, said the only requirement for someone to apply for compensation is that they be the victim of a violent crime in Ontario.

He said the CICB can award compensation even if there isn't a conviction.

But, he said, no compensation can be made while a case is in court.

"If there are criminal proceedings underway, it's the usual practise of the board to await their outcome because the board can then take a conviction as proof that a violent crime did occur," Owens said.

That, Joseph said, is precisely the problem.

"When you're hurt, your child is dying or dead, and your other children need psychological counselling [and other services not covered by OHIP], something must be done immediately.

"We can't wait," he said.

"People believe that the system functions well and they do not realize the failure of the system until they are affected by it," Baranovski said. "My hope is that others will see the failures of the system. I am not fighting for myself. I am fighting for our future."

Israel and the Middle East: On the Road to Where?

Three years after the eruption of a campaign of violence against Israel, the Middle East remains in seemingly perpetual conflict. The current Road Map has few passionate supporters, yet might one day provide a path toward hope. And so, this fall, with the help of four exceptional minds, we will reflect on the current moment.

Yad Vashem launches jubilee year with ceremony

By LAUREN KRUGEL
Special to The CJN

As Yad Vashem, the Holocaust martyrs and heroes remembrance authority, marks its 50th anniversary, it will look to younger generations to pass on the stories of the six million Jews who perished in the Shoah.

Remembering the past, shaping the future, is the theme of Yad Vashem's jubilee year, which will officially begin next week.

There will be an opening ceremony in the Warsaw Ghetto Square, which will be attended by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and President Moshe Katsav.

Later in the week, two commemorative stamps will be dedicated by the Philatelic Service in honour of the milestone event.

Education is key in involving young Jews in Holocaust remembrance, said foreign media liaison Rachel Fadlon, and to that end, Yad Vashem plans to increase its educational outreach from 10 to 40 per cent of its activities this year.

"We're trying to reach out through the educators. That's the way to reach out to kids," said Fadlon.

Yad Vashem has the only international school for Holocaust studies in the world, teaching 100,000 people each year. It also has extensive academic resources available to the public. The organization plans to expand all of these activities for students and educators from Israel and abroad.

Another way that Yad Vashem plans to attract youth will be to make its main museum more much more interactive, said Fadlon.

In 2004, Yad Vashem will be replacing the main museum with a new one triple its size.

The focus will not only be on the hard facts and figures of the Holocaust, but rather on their "personal, private stories," said Fadlon.

Black and white photographs, personal possessions, multimedia presentations and a new wall of names will make the experience more real for visitors. There will also be exhibits about what Jewish life in Europe was like before the Nazis rose to power.

Diaspora communities around the world will also be participating in the jubilee celebrations throughout the year.

To coincide with the opening celebrations, 36 Canadians will be joining a mission to Israel Sept. 9 to 18.

In November, a dinner gala will be held in honour of Yad Vashem's anniversary at the Sheraton Hotel in Toronto, with a keynote speech from Israel's deputy prime minister, Ehud Olmert.

Hetty Shapiro of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem said she expects 1,000 people to attend the event.

Russian paper apologizes for ‘anti-Semitic’ article

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A Russian-language weekly newspaper in Toronto has printed an apology to readers who were offended by an article that many condemned as anti-Semitic.

In the piece, written from Lvov, Ukrainian academic Valery Serduchenko writes that a “group of the sons of Abraham” has “undressed the country down to the underwear” by privatizing government assets.

But Arkadi Turin, editor of Russian Canadian Info, denied the article was offensive.

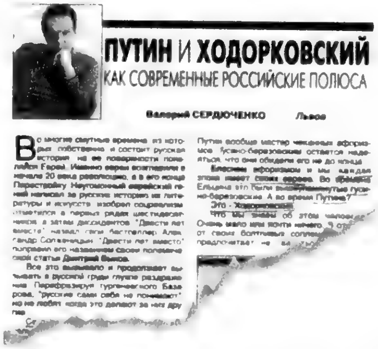
“I don’t think it was anti-Jewish,” said Turin, a 43-year-old professional journalist who immigrated to Canada from Moscow 13 years ago. “It was directed against a very small group of people called the oligarchs, and unfortunately, some of them are Jewish.”

Boris Nusenbaum, the Jewish proprietor of Russian Canadian Info, said the article did not offend him. It was an acerbic commentary on wealthy Jewish businessmen in Russia, collectively known as oligarchs, who made vast fortunes after the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991.

“I didn’t feel, as a Jew, an assault from Serduchenko,” said Nusenbaum, whose publication appears in slimmer editions in Montreal and Ottawa.

But Nusenbaum, a musician by training who immigrated to Canada in 1990 via New York City, acknowledged he received indignant letters from readers about Serduchenko’s article.



ПУТИН И ХОДОРКОВСКИЙ
КАК СОВРЕМЕННЫЕ РОССИЙСКИЕ ПОЛЮСА

Валерий СЕРДЮЧЕНКО Львов

Alex Levin, a Holocaust survivor, Red Army veteran and former resident of Moscow who has lived in Canada since 1975, was outraged. He accused Serduchenko of obsessing about Jewish oligarchs while not even bothering to mention non-Jewish ones.

“The Russian community is boiling with anger,” he declared. “How could a Jew print this?”

He said he planned to ask advertisers to boycott Russian Canadian Info, whose circulation is about 15,000.

The article, translated for Levin by an experienced and reputable Russian-to-English translator, contains passages that could have come from the pages of the notorious anti-Semitic Czarist tract The Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

In the opening sentence of his article, Serduchenko writes: “In many troubled times, of which, basically, consists of Russian history, a Jew surfaced.”

“All this has caused and continues to cause exasperation in Russian souls,” he observes in the second paragraph.

In a direct reference to Jewish oligarchs Boris Berezovsky, Roman Abramovich, Vladimir Gusinsky and others, he states: “Another group of the sons of Abraham arranged a privatization campaign in Russia and undressed the country down to the underwear, and a Jew with an operatic last name of Abramovich became the chief person in Chukotka [a vast region in eastern Russia].”

In the third paragraph, he writes: “It is hard even to imagine more Jewish and, alas, less likeable Jews. Generally undereducated, they started to worm themselves into all the crevices of Russian life…

“Gusinsky proclaimed himself to be the president of the self-made World Jewish Congress, stuck a kippah on his head and started to show it off on the screens of Russian television.”

In a reference to Mikhail Khodorkovsky, an oil magnate whom Forbes magazine has called the richest man in Russia, Serduchenko says, “[He] is a cosmopolitan, a ‘citizen of the world,’ and carries his homeland on the soles of his shoes. Russia, for Khodorkovsky, is a cheap work force, while for [Russian President Vladimir] Putin, it is his fate, soul, heart, his… human composition.”

Toward the close of the article, Serduchenko notes: “It is not the nationality but the truth that matters, and one of the truths is that there should not be too much or too little Jewish percentage in the genetic substance of any nation. Each time when this percentage becomes too high, the nations become enraged.”

As a result, he warned, pogroms are bound to occur.

“Jews, be alert!” he warns.

Alexander Maryasin, another angry reader, described the article as “despicable,” “unspeakably anti-Semitic” and “ugly,” saying he was shocked such material can be printed in Canada.

Yoseph Zaltzman, the senior rabbi at the Jewish Russian Community Centre in Toronto, was equally upset.

“I was definitely not pleased to see it,” he said, saying he was particularly upset by a sentence in the article that he said morally legit-

Russian paper editor regrets publishing article

imizes anti-Semitism. "I wouldn't have printed it."

In a commentary in Russian Express – a Russian newspaper based in Toronto – Abram Kackin, a Ukrainian Jewish journalist who settled in Canada 13 years ago, compared Serduchenko's article to "garbage" published in "fascist newspapers" in the 1930s.

Asked whether the article was anti-Semitic, Igor Korenzvit, a member of The CJN's editorial advisory board, replied, "Very much so."

He then expressed surprise that it had been printed in a publication whose owner is Jewish and whose staff and readership are primarily Jewish.

"I would have expected more sensitivity and sense from them."

Nusenbaum, who also publishes the newspaper Gazeta Plus, conceded that Serduchenko's foray into genetics could be construed as anti-Semitic.

"But the views in this article are not anti-Semitic," he added.

A native of St. Petersburg who said he left Russia to escape anti-Semitism, Nusenbaum, 50, said the oligarchs with Jewish surnames "bring anti-Semitism to Russian and Ukrainian souls."

He claimed that the English translation of the article was not entirely accurate or clear, and that the translator, who prefers to remain anonymous, works for his competitors.

Turin said Serduchenko, whom he complimented as a "talented" writer, was merely reflecting "a common opinion which is popular in Russia.

"From the ordinary Russians' point of view, the oligarchs are criminals who rule Russia. Serduchenko said to Jews: be careful. He was not especially critical of Jews."

Asked why Serduchenko had not discussed the role of non-Jewish oligarchs in the Russian economy, Turin said, "There are only one or two."

But Turin said he now regrets having published Serduchenko's article.

"I made a mistake. Judging by the reaction of our readers, I wasn't completely right, and I accept my responsibility."

He now agrees that the author's language was "a little bit over the top," and that he did not exercise sensitivity as an editor.

"Some of our readers are Holocaust survivors," he said.

In a concession to their sensitivities, Russian Canadian Info ran an apology to readers who were offended by the article, as well as letters critical of Serduchenko.

Turin said he will no longer accept contributions from him on similar topics. "He's temperamental and goes over the top."

He said as far as he is concerned, the matter is closed.

Excerpts of apology

Excerpts from Russian Canadian Info*'s apology, as translated from the Russian by a reader, Alex Levin:*

First question: Why are you publishing this author?

Because he is a talented one. And talent we admire…

As a smart person, [Serduchenko] is not choosing between a Russian and a Jew but between two models of the development of [Russia]…

Serduchenko does not feel how wounded are the people who… in their lives were discriminated against because of their nationality.

Only because of this I want to apologize to people who were offended by his article.

Koffler youth choir gets new name, director

By LAUREN KRUGEL
Special to The CJN

Allan Friedman says he looks forward to"breathing new life" into the Renanim Youth Chorus this fall as he assumes the role of choir director.

And with a new director comes a new spirit for the group, says Adrienne Cohen, director of the Koffler School of Music. As such, the choir will be renamed the Koffler Nashir Children's Choir and feature youth aged 12 to 16.

Friedman, who has taught music for more than two decades, has had a love of Jewish music from an early age.

Whether the music is religious or festive, he says Jewish songs have a lot of "ruach."

"The words carry so much meaning. If you find the right music to go along with it, it's so beautiful it makes you want to cry."

The new choir director is familiar with Toronto's Jewish music scene. He spent many years teaching music at Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, as well as leading a joint University of Toronto and York University Jewish choir. He has also been an accompanist at a number of Jewish festivals and events around the GTA.

Auditions for the choir were held late June and more can be scheduled this fall through the school. Although it is not necessary for choir hopefuls to have a musical background, Cohen says "many can sing and do have musical gifts."

However, she says, musical talent is not the only criterion when choosing choir members. Enthusiasm, an appreciation and love of music and commitment are also important.

"They have to want this," she says.

If the kids are passionate about singing and are dedicated to the choir, Friedman says the rest is easy.

When assembling a chorus, he picks songs that he feels suits the spirit of his group. In addition to Jewish music, he also dabbles in jazz and Broadway tunes.

Next, he divides his group into two or three sub-groups according to vocal range: soprano, alto and tenor. He says he has a particular passion for creating multi-layered harmonies.

Once each group has perfected its part, it's then time to bring the music together.

"Once you've got a song that has come together, the kids belt it out with all their hearts," he says.

One of the most important aspects of the choir is the relationships that come from members working together to make music, Cohen says. Students from Jewish day schools and public schools who wouldn't ordinarily interact have bonded through their singing.

Cohen and Friedman both say the choir's main goal is to keep it fun.

"At the end of the day, you have a choir that can go places," says Cohen.

Sherman was society president for 60 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Obituary

William Sherman, who served as president of the Lipsker Young Mens Society for more than 60 years, died recently at age 91.

He was the son of Samuel who came here from Lipsk, Poland in 1905, and in 1930 started Sherman Tailors on College Street.

Samuel's three sons, Teddy, the late Sollie and William, joined their father in business. The store was sold two years ago.

In 1930, Samuel became a founding member of the Lipsker Society, and in 1943, William accepted the position of president.

Teddy, who is also active in the society, said his brother was president for life.

"Willie was the most honest person I ever knew. You could always count on him. He was known for his dedication to the Lipsker, and was available 24 hours a day," said Teddy.

Allan Goldreich, secretary of the society, and the third generation in his family to be involved in the landsmanshaft, said, "As long as Willie Sherman was president, he was totally dedicated to the society—b'emunah, with total conviction."

Rabbi Meir Gottesman, spiritual Leader of the Emunah Shleima Synagogue, where William was the first person to daven for the High Holy Days 25 years ago, said,"He was a wonderful, excellent and warm-hearted mensch and like a second father to me. William is irreplaceable. He and his wife dedicated a memorial board to our shul and he was loving and devoted to his family."

In a telephone interview, Sherman's grandson Phillip Kamin who lives in New York, said, "My grandfather was an extraordinary man and loved by all types of people and animals. His motto was, 'A man's good name is worth more than all the money in the world.' He taught me many things."

Sherman is survived by his wife Bella; daughter Terri Kamin; three grandchildren and two great-grandchildren. He was brother and brother-in-law of Doris Miller, and Teddy and Eve Sherman.

Key ridings to watch

• In St. Paul's, which is about one-fifth Jewish, the incumbent Liberal Michael Bryant should have little trouble against Conservative Charis Kelso, an employee at Queen's Park, and the NDP's Julian Heller, a Jewish lawyer and longtime activist. In 1999, Bryant upset Isabel Bassett in the riding.

• Observers say that if the Liberals are to break the Tories' lock on the affluent 905 ridings around Toronto, their best bet is in Thornhill – at 33 per cent, it's Ontario's most Jewish riding.

In 1999, the Conservatives won Thornhill by a mere 343 votes, by far the narrowest margin in the 905 region. At the time, Tory Tina Molinari was against public funding for private and religious schools and was nearly defeated by Dan Ronen, a high-profile activist in the Jewish community.

(The campaign was marred by a telephone poll that asked residents whether they would be comfortable voting for a "member" of Canadian Jewish Congress and the son of a Holocaust survivor. Ronen's father is an Auschwitz survivor. The Tories apologized for the poll and fired their pollster.)

But as an MPP, Molinari has become among the most vocal supporters of the tax credit. This time, she faces a challenge from Liberal hopeful Mario Racco, a longtime Vaughan councillor who had the federal Liberal nomination in Thornhill taken from him in 1997, when Prime Minister Jean Chrétien appointed Elinor Caplan as the candidate.

Also running in Thornhill is the NDP's Laurie Orrett, an executive assistant at Queen's Park. In 1999, the NDP won less than four per cent of the vote in Thornhill.

• In Vaughan-King-Aurora, Greg Sorbara, who's also president and campaign chair of the provincial Liberal Party, should have little trouble fending off the challenge of Conservative Carmine Iacono, a lawyer, and the NDP's Mike Seaward, a trade unionist and community activist. Sorbara is on record as having stated about a decade ago that he favoured government aid for private schools, but has since waffled on the issue.

• In Willowdale, David Young, the only Jewish member of the Tory government and cabinet, faces Liberal David Zimmer, a lawyer and chairman of the Toronto Community Housing Corp. and Yvonne Bobb, a government employee and advocate running for the NDP. In the last vote, Young won by 3,500 votes, not considered a very large margin.

• And in York Centre, veteran Liberal Monte Kwinter is seeking his sixth term. Kwinter, 72, is not expecting a big challenge from his Tory opponent, Daniel Cullen, an engineer, or from the NDP's Matt Norrish, a student. Earlier this year, Kwinter won applause in Jewish circles for voting against his own party and supporting the government's entrenchment of the education tax credit into law.

School funding advocate remembered for helping others

Obituary

Murray Segal kept a low profile but served as a high-level community volunteer for many years, most notably as the first chair of the Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education (OJAEE), a committee formed in 1984 by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, to fight for government funding for Jewish day schools. He held that position for almost 15 years.

Murray Segal

The Winnipeg native, a longtime resident of Toronto, died of cancer Sept. 1, at Sunnybrook Hospital. He was 63.

Bernie Farber, executive director of CJC, Ontario region, who worked with Segal on the OJAEE comittee, recalled Segal's integrity and his ability to "parse the most complex arguments down into language everyone could understand."

He also had a wry sense of humour that helped reduce tension when arguments became passionate, Farber added. "I don't believe there was a premier, Opposition leader or minister of education who did not come away with a huge level of respect for Murray Segal."

There's no question, Farber said, that Segal paved the way for the Ontario government's Equity in Education tax credit given to parents of Jewish day school and other private school students since it came into effect in 2001.

Keith Landy, president of CJC, Ontario region, knew Segal in his professional capacity as an actuary, as well as in his community role.

Segal, a partner in Eckler Partners, the largest independent Canadian-owned actuarial consulting firm, was called to testify as an expert on numerous occasions, said Landy, a commercial and personal injury litigation lawyer. "He had a brilliant insight, not just into the financial aspect of a case. He had a very analytical way of thinking and was quoted in many cases. He had the respect of the judiciary and the lawyers who worked with him."

A graduate of the University of Manitoba where he was a gold medal winner in actuarial science, Segal moved to Toronto in 1959 after a year of study at a Chicago yeshiva.

An active member of B'nai Torah Congregation, Segal was involved in every major congregational decision but "never allowed himself to be in the limelight," according to Rabbi Raphael Marcus.

Segal was also involved in UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and received its Shem Tov award for his contributions. In the late 1970s, as treasurer of its board of directors, Segal helped develop the pension plan for UJA Federation and its Board of Jewish Education staff.

He "gave a lot of charity, and most of it was anonymous," said close friend Jack Kahn, president of Mizrachi Canada. His main charitable focus was helping individuals and families in need, he added.

"Everybody had a story to tell about Murray, and he loved to tell stories as well," said Kahn. "He was a real character. Everybody loved him – he was a true spokesman for the community."

Kahn also remembers his friend as a scholar with a "tremendous knowledge" of Tanach and a love for the State of Israel.

Segal is survived by his wife Marlene; children Gerald, of Israel, Ernest and Moshe, both of Toronto; and five grandchildren.

Toronto duo set record for longest air hockey game

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Jaron Carson and Jordan Ouanounou wanted their summer to end with more than just a bang. They wanted it to end with the soft clink of an air hockey puck landing in its net, the roar of a crowd and the world record for the longest air hockey game.

On Aug. 27, the two Toronto men achieved their summer's goal. After 20 hours and more than 200 air hockey games at the mega-entertainment complex Dave and Buster's, the fiercely competitive duo earned themselves a spot in the Guinness Book of World Records.

"We were happy because it's something that we thought of as a joke and decided to take it all the way," said Carson, 24.

The idea for their world record attempt began when Ouanounou, 23, saw a Guinness Book of World Records. At first he wanted to set the record for pinning 117 clothespins to a friend's face, but had to look for a new idea when the friend refused to co-operate. Carson and Ouanounou were playing air hockey – their favourite pastime – at Dave and Buster's when they came up with the idea of an air hockey marathon.

Ouanounou took full credit for the idea. "In essence, this is like forming a company," he said, as they relaxed at a cafe between media stops two weeks before the event. "I'm the CEO, the brains. Jaron is the vice-president. He does all the preparation."

"100 per cent of the legwork," Carson said.

Once The Guinness Book of World Records approved their idea – it was the first air hockey request they had received – the duo began planning their strategy. Carson made sure that everything about their attempt was in line with Guinness' rules. He arranged for Dave and Buster's to host the event and for witnesses and emergency personnel – required by Guinness – to be there.

Then they each set out their personal rules. They wanted to play for 24 hours, they wanted to keep score and they both wanted to win.

"Las Vegas has me ahead by 1½ points," Ouanounou had said.

"Las Vegas has nothing," Carson cut in. "But I think I'm going to win."

They practised playing with their right hands. Then they practised with their left hands. They practised eating and playing and staying up all night. But in the end, Carson and Ouanounou stopped after 20½ hours because they felt they couldn't keep going.

"No amount of practising in the world could have prepared us for what we did," said Carson.

"We thought of giving up there because it was mentally draining, physically draining. You can't go watch TV for an hour or take a nap for an hour then go back."

The final score was 1274 for Ouanounou and 1093 for Carson.

"Near the end, I was concentrating more on the time and he was still focused on the score," Carson said.

According to Guinness' rules, they were allowed a 15-minute break every eight hours. The problem of what to do if the urge to go to the bathroom struck between breaks loomed large.

"We didn't eat," Carson said. "We were scared to eat or drink because of our break limitation."

Holiday Food Ideas

New Years cards courtesy of Jewish Holiday Style, Simon & Schuster publishing

L' Shanah Tovah

Rosh Hashanah is a time for celebration and a time for introspection, for looking back upon the past year and looking forward to the year to come.

It is also a time to put aside our hectic schedules, gather with our family and friends, and revel in the joy of partaking in a holiday meal together.

For many young, inexperienced cooks, however, creating a holiday menu can be a daunting experience. Year after year, they've seen their mothers and grandmothers prepare a veritable feast, yet when it is their turn, they feel overwhelmed. How can they compete with such expertise?

For the most part, their mothers and grandmothers felt the same way, and they obtained many of their recipes from their own mothers and grandmothers. They were not experts, but they carefully followed these recipes, sometimes altering them slightly to make them a little less salty or a little more sweet.

If their mothers cooked brisket or chicken soup a certain way, chances are – give or take a few more spoonfuls of this or a few less spoonfuls of that – that is how they prepare them for their own family.

By following these recipes, they not only create a wonderful meal, they preserve memories. Their ancestors may not be at their holiday table, but their spirits linger in these beloved dishes.

In this year's holiday food supplement, we've supplied some recipes for dishes that have graced the tables of our writers' parents and grandparents. Perhaps their memories can become part of your family's traditions.

From all of us at The CJN, we wish you Shanah Tovah.

Fruit a staple in Middle-Eastern fare

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Birthplace of the world's three major religions – Judaism, Christianity and Islam – the Middle East explodes with tension, terror and, yes… taste!

"It is amazing how all these people who can't get along eat the same things," observes Faye Levy, whose latest cookbook, Feast from the Mideast: 250 Sun-Drenched Dishes from the Lands of the Bible (HarperCollins), highlights the delectable cuisine of more than 10 countries, whose politicos could take a cue from its cooks.

"Eating together and discussing food and recipes is a great way to bring people closer," Levy continues. "Arabs and Jews share a lot of the same food. The Islamic rules of halal are similar to our laws of kashrut. We both don't eat pork. Arabs do eat shellfish, and they don't have a problem mixing milk and meat, but they hardly ever do it.

"Take moussaka, for example. The authentic Middle Eastern way to prepare it is without cheese."

For almost 12 years, Levy lived in Israel, where she met and married her husband, Yakir. A cooking novice until her mother-in-law took her in hand, she soon developed a love for the varied, bold flavours of her adopted home. She went on to train at the renowned Paris cooking school La Varenne, and to produce more than 20 cookbooks and write with authority and passion on the cuisine of the Middle East.

While the book explores the foods of all faiths and nationalities of the region, many of the dishes are perfect for Rosh Hashanah because of the Middle Eastern fondness for incorporating local fruits, a perfect way to wish guests a sweet New Year.

While apples and honey are de rigueur among Ashkenazim for celebrating the New Year, Middle Easterners turn to the more exotic, like dates, quinces or pomegranates.

"Sephardi Jews begin the Rosh Hashanah meal with dates, just as we do with apples and honey," notes Levy. "And in Greece, Turkey and Morocco, all around the Mediterranean really, quinces are really important for Rosh Hashanah. Moroccan Jews do dip apples in honey, then dip them in sesame seeds, symbolizing our wish that our people be numerous. Pomegranate seeds are traditional for the same reason."

> 'Sephardi Jews begin the Rosh Hashanah meal with dates, just as we do with apples and honey'

Chicken in Pomegranate Walnut Sauce, a classic dish of the Persian kitchen, is appropriate for the holiday, suggests Levy. "Pomegranate juice and paste are available in Middle Eastern and gourmet markets, because a lot of American chefs, like Bobby Flay, have suddenly become very excited about them. It has become trendy."

If you can't find pomegranate paste, Levy advises using pomegranate juice, now available in supermarkets, and adding less water.

Traditional holiday foods vary from country to country and from family to family. Some people avoid sour tastes for the holiday, like lemons and vinegar. Persians, however, favour tart over sweet and love a splash of lemon juice on many dishes, notes Levy. "In fact, I have a friend from northern Iran who says that the pomegranate paste available in this country is too sweet, so he asks his relatives from Iran to bring some from home when they visit."

Some people avoid black ingredients for the New Year, so they use golden raisins instead of dark, and do not serve eggplant. Since the word for leeks in Hebrew means "destroyed," many serve leeks to convey the wish that our enemies be destroyed.

Some people will not eat walnuts, but will use almonds. Others eliminate nuts altogether. "In our family, we always have rice with toasted almonds and dried fruit for Rosh Hashanah," says Levy. "Middle Eastern cooks have so many delicious ways to do rice, and some, like Almond Apricot Basmati Rice, are so good you could consider them a dessert, a side dish or a main course.

"Sweetness for Rosh Hashanah is more of an Ashkenazi thing, though certain Middle Eastern Jews do it too. Moroccans often serve vegetables sprinkled with sugar, but sometimes instead of making food sweeter, they might just tone down the spiciness." For example, fish is traditional for Rosh Hashanah, particularly served with the head.

Moroccans might make Foil Baked Trout with Red Pepper and Garlic, but omit the jalapeno and lemon for Rosh Hashanah. "It really depends on your family's tradition."

For Ashkenazim, Rosh Hashanah would not be complete without honey cake, but Sephardim of the Mediterranean may choose Citrus and Spice Quinces with Cranberries or Date Pinwheel Cookies. Honey isn't necessarily found in desserts in the Middle East, says Levy, though some might use it as syrup on cake. Fruit with Honey, Figs and Dates will appeal to both camps as a sweet ending to the Rosh Hashanah dinner.

"It's perfect for the season and really easy. And it goes well as a topping for traditional honey cake too."

CHICKEN IN PERSIAN POMEGRANATE WALNUT SAUCE

2 tbsp. vegetable oil
2½ lb. chicken pieces, rinsed and patted dry
1 large onion, chopped
1½ to 2 cups walnuts
1 tbsp. all-purpose flour (optional)
1½ to 2 cups pomegranate juice or ⅓ to ½ cup pomegranate paste
½ cup water or chicken broth (if using pomegranate juice), or 1½ cups water or broth (if using paste)
salt and freshly ground black pepper
1 to 2 tbsp. tomato paste or 3 to 4 tbsp. tomato sauce (optional)
1 tsp. ground cardamom, or ½ tsp. cinnamon, or to taste
1 tbsp. fresh-squeezed lemon juice, or to taste
1 to 2 tsp. sugar, or to taste
⅓ to ½ cup pomegranate seeds (optional)
1 tbsp. chopped Italian parsley (optional)
a few toasted walnuts (optional)

Heat oil in heavy, wide casserole or Dutch oven. Add chicken in batches and sauté over medium-high heat until brown. Remove chicken to plate.

Discard fat from pan, leaving 1 to 2 tbsp. Add onion to pan and sauté over medium heat for 7 minutes, or until golden. Meanwhile, finely chop walnuts with pulsing motion of food processor.

Reduce heat to low. Stir in flour, then walnuts, and cook over low heat, stirring, for 1 minute. Stir in pomegranate juice and ½ cup water (or pomegranate paste and 1½ cups water), and bring to a simmer, stirring.

Add chicken and any juices on plate to pan. Sprinkle chicken with salt and pepper. Cover and cook over low heat about 45 minutes for breast pieces or 40 to 45 minutes for leg and thigh pieces, or until chicken is tender, turning occasionally.

Remove chicken from pan. Add tomato paste, if you like, and cardamom to sauce, and simmer until thickened to your taste. Taste, adjust seasoning, and add lemon juice and sugar if needed. If you like, whisk in a few more teaspoons pomegranate juice or paste. Return chicken to sauce and heat through.

Cooking... Middle-Eastern Style

Serve hot, garnished if you like with pomegranate seeds, parsley or walnuts, or all three.

ALMOND APRICOT BASMATI RICE

8 to 12 whole dried apricots, plus ½ cup diced dried apricots
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 onion, minced
1½ cups white basmati rice, rinsed and drained
2½ cups hot water
salt and freshly ground black pepper, to taste
1 tbsp. sugar
½ cup slivered or whole blanched almonds, toasted

Put whole apricots in bowl and cover with water. Leave them to soak while rice cooks.

To cook rice, heat 2 tbsp. oil in large saucepan. Add onion and cook over low heat for seven minutes, or until soft but not brown, stirring occasionally.

Add rice, diced apricots, 2½ cups hot water, salt and pepper and bring to a boil over high heat. Cover and cook over low heat, without stirring, for 18 minutes, or until rice is just tender and liquid is absorbed. Remove from heat.

Cover rice and let it stand for 10 to15 minutes. Meanwhile, transfer apricot soaking liquid to very small saucepan. Add sugar and stir to blend. Cut the whole apricots in two if they are large and add to saucepan. Add enough water to barely cover the apricots. Bring to a simmer. Cover and cook over low heat for three minutes, or until apricots are just tender.

Fluff rice very gently with a fork. Mound on a platter and garnish with toasted almonds. Remove poached apricots from liquid with a slotted spoon and set them on rice. Serve hot. Makes 4 servings.

FRUIT SALAD WITH HONEY, FIGS AND DATES

1 to 2 tbsp. honey
1 to 1½ tbsp. fresh-squeezed lime or lemon juice
1 tbsp. water
1 banana
2 peaches or ripe pears
2 cups halved or quartered fresh figs
1 cup plump, good quality dates
1 to 2 tbsp. slivered almonds, toasted

Mix 1 tbsp. honey with 1 tbsp. lime juice and water in serving bowl. Peel and slice bananas; add to bowl. Cut peaches or pears in wedges and add them. Add figs and dates. Mix gently. Add remaining honey and lime juice if you like. Refrigerate until ready to serve. Serve topped with almonds. Makes 4 servings.

UJA Toronto sets record for North American missions

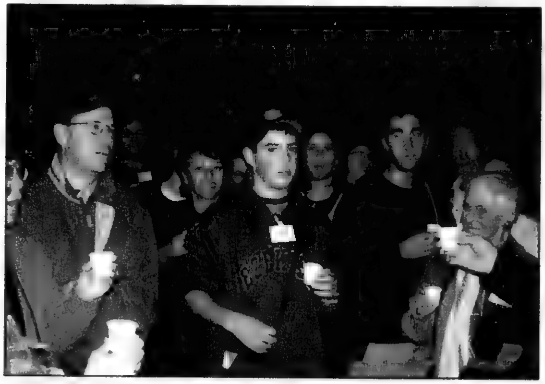
Toronto Federation sends more missions than others combined

By Daniel Horowitz

UJA Federation's 40th solidarity mission to Israel over the past three years has just returned.

Since October 2000, nearly 2,000 people have participated in UJA Federation's unique monthly missions program.

In fact, Toronto has sent more people to Israel to show their support and solidarity than any other North American community over the past three years. UJA Federation has organized missions for all age groups at all times of year. Many were conducted in conjunction with other community organizations. And the program, averaging a mission a month, is still operating at full capacity.



Mission participants enjoy kiddush at the Kotel.

"It's a tremendous thing that we've accomplished with these regular missions," says David Koschitzky, a past UJA Federation Campaign Chair who helped initiate the idea with fellow Past Chair, Michael Bregman. "Forty missions in three years is wonderful. Not only are we supporting Israel, but we're helping the people who participate on these missions as well," says Koschitzky.

These missions have been vital to the participants and to the people of Israel, and, according to UJA Federation Board Chair, Leslie Gales, a recent mission participant herself, maintaining the missions program well into the future is equally essential.

"Absolutely," says Gales. "It is imperative that we continue to send regular missions to Israel. Not only do these missions give Israelis a spiritual lift, it's also important that Torontonians get connected – or reconnected – to the people and the land of Israel. I also hope to see many, many young people go on our missions in the future. It's important that they connect with Israel the further and further away we get from the Holocaust so that they can pass on the meaning of Israel to their children."

Mission participant Dodi Weill, with Israeli tour guide Ezra Eini.

"My first trip to Israel was at the age of eighteen and I still go as often as I can, and always on missions," says Dodi Weill. "On a mission you learn to understand Israel from a much deeper perspective and it prepares you to be an ambassador for Israel when you return. You meet the most interesting people both as participants and as speakers. The beauty, the miracle, the sense of history and yes, the passion, still mesmerize me. It is where I am most at peace."

""It's hard to explain unless you are actually in Israel," says Gales, "but missions touch you in a very dramatic, very different way. By actually being in Israel, Diaspora Jews have the wonderful opportunity to touch, taste, and feel the real Israel, and to get a firsthand look at how vital this incredible land is to all Jews everywhere. This is something that we must never take for granted. UJA Federation missions will continue to provide this important opportunity now, and well into the future."

The mission that launched it all

Shortly after the outbreak of the ongoing Palestinian violence against Israel in September 2000, UJA leaders – including the Chairs of Campaign 2002, David Koschitzky and Michael Bregman – held a series of urgent strategic meetings designed to find immediate and consistent ways of demonstrating Toronto's solidarity with the beleaguered State. From those meetings, UJA Federation's "Mission-a-Month" philosophy was established.

Less than a month later, UJA Federation's first solidarity mission touched down at Ben Gurion airport in Tel Aviv. That mission, from October 29 to November 4, included 16 participants.

"I remember it very well. It was such an incredible experience being in Israel so quickly after the outbreak of terror," says mission participant Cheryl Halberstadt. "All of a sudden, there I was, in Jerusalem, sitting across the table from Jerusalem Mayor, Ehud Olmert, discussing the situation at dinner. It was almost surreal."

"That mission was such an incredible opportunity," remembers Barry Zagdanski, who, along with his son Joshua, participated. "It was the morning after my son Joshua's bar mitzvah and he came with me. I thought it was a great way to bring a Jewish boy into adulthood. I went because I wanted to learn, first-hand, what exactly was going on from Israeli leaders. That's what's so great about UJA missions – you meet the "who's who" of Israeli leaders. At the time of that October 2000 mission, people were already being warned not to go to Israel. It was always on the news; there were even governmental travel advisories being issued not to go. I knew that it was important to go to Israel right away, and that's what we did."

SOLIDARI...
MISSION WITH ISRAEL

Some of the participants of the October 2000 Israel Solidarity Mission stand outside the entrance to the Old City in Jerusalem.

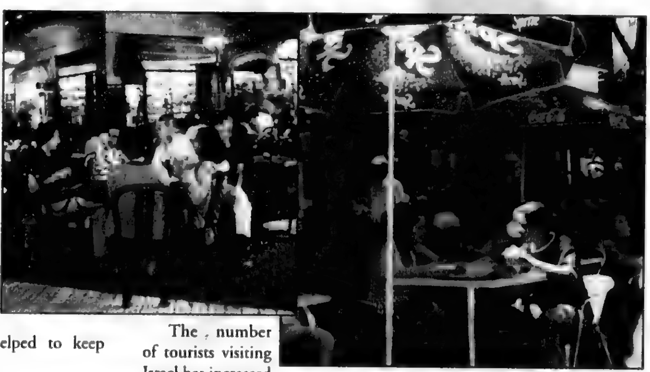
"There is nothing that compares with being in Israel, among Israelis, for solidifying our connection, demonstrating support, and understanding the realities of the challenges Israelis are enduring every day," says Bregman, a participant on the recent Prime Minister's Mission. "While our families and friends in Toronto were worried about our safety during a turbulent week, all of us on the mission agreed that we felt totally secure and overwhelmingly positive about our decision to go to Israel at that time."

"It is actually kind of sad," adds Halberstadt, "how often Israelis would come up to us in the streets to thank us over and over again for being there for them. It's crazy, because we're there for maybe a week to visit, but it is they who remain, fighting for our very existence as Jews. It is them that we must thank by continuing to go to Israel."

Missions: the lifeblood of Israel's economy

The numbers say it all. In 2000, before the Palestinian wave of violence began, the number of tourists visiting Israel was approaching three million. In 2001, those numbers began to drop severely, with only one million people visiting. In 2002, Israel attracted only 800,000 global visitors.

However, North American solidarity missions, especially the 40 missions from Toronto, helped to keep tourism alive.



Visitors to Israel enjoy lunch on Ben Yehuda Street.

The number of tourists visiting Israel has increased every month from April to July of this year. Israel's Ministry of Tourism is predicting 1.2 million tourists in 2003.

"Early in the very dark days, during the peak of violence, North American solidarity missions to Israel - such as the UJA Federation missions – were the only real source of blood in our veins," says Haim Shkedi, general manager of Jerusalem's venerable 200-room King David Hotel. "These missions have helped the King David and other hotels to at least maintain a core of employees on staff."

But, according to Shkedi, since the Iraq war, things are looking up for Israeli tourism. Around Passover, figures began to climb again, this time reaching the 55 percent occupancy rate.

"Things are now looking even better," says Shkedi. "If you can believe it, my hotel is completely booked – that's 100 percent full – for this coming Sukkot in Israel."

UJA Federation took the initiative when it was needed the most, and understood the urgency of solidarity missions to Israel, right away," says Dani Shahal, Israel's consul for tourism in Canada.

Rodney Sanders, General Manager of Jerusalem's Inbal Hotel, wholeheartedly agrees with Shahal's assertion.

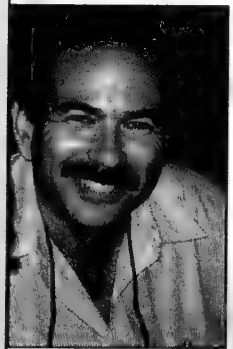
"The Inbal Hotel and the people of Israel have been personally touched by these missions, giving us all strength and encouragement during these difficult times so that we know we are not alone," says Sanders.

And, adds Shahal, Israelis are not the only ones who benefit from these missions.

"When the people of Israel see the tourists on their streets, they are very happy and grateful for it. But it's also the people on the missions themselves, the Torontonians, who are also very touched when they get home because they see what a difference they can play in the lives of Israelis."

According to Victor Yagoda, Deputy Director General, United Israel Appeal of Canada, Toronto's presence in Israel means so much to its citizens.

"Toronto's Jewish community has sent the largest number of groups to Israel from the whole world," says Yagoda from his office in Israel. "After three years of terror attacks, we have hosted 40 groups from Toronto. I am delighted that this trend is continuing at the same pace. This is an unprecedented statement of solidarity and unity with the people of Israel. We feel as if all Jewish streets in Toronto lead to Israel."



Victor Yagoda, Deputy Director General, United Israel Appeal of Canada.

Mission participants reap benefits

While UJA Federation's solidarity missions are designed to support Israel, its people, and its economy, mission participants themselves also benefit greatly. On many occasions, they return to Toronto with a strong sense of accomplishment for having been involved proactively with Israel's well-being.

"Believe me, I was not someone who was likely to ever go on a mission to Israel," says Jonathan Kirshblum, a participant on the October 2002 joint UJA Federation-Israel Bonds solidarity mission. "The war with the Palestinians is a spiritual war, testing the spiritual resolve of the Israelis. I learned that by sending mission after mission to Israel, we are showing Israelis that they are not alone, and that missions are vital for their spiritual well being, and ours, as Jews, as well."

For Phillip Ladovsky, Israel solidarity missions serve as wonderful educational tools for Jews of every age.

"I go on missions because it's essential that as many of us go as possible," says Ladovsky, who brought along his son, Nathan, a recent bar mitzvah. "But, I also went because I wanted Nathan to see Israel firsthand."

Ladovsky figured that it was time for Nathan – who has spent the past 8 years involved in Zionist studies at Bialik – to step out from the pages of a book and onto the land of Israel itself. "The time was right for my son to go and appreciate Israel for all that it is," adds Ladovsky. "I wanted him to meet its remarkable people, to touch its earth, and breathe its air. He did it, and, hopefully, we'll do it again with my two other sons."

For Sharon Goelman and husband Louis, Israel proved to be the perfect gift to celebrate their 40th wedding anniversary.

"My husband and I were going to go on a big trip somewhere to celebrate, maybe even a cruise," says Goelman. "But, I suddenly realized, 'how can we go anywhere but Israel?' That was it. We went on a UJA Mission before Pesach and it was one of the most incredibly exhilarating and invigorating experiences of our lives."

"These missions are really incredible experiences," says Jerry Balitsky, a member of a July 2002 mission, along with his wife, Tammy. "When you're actually in Israel, seeing the faces, meeting with government officials, people on the inside, it's unbelievable. If you weren't on a UJA mission, you wouldn't have the chance to meet these wonderful people. But as wonderful as these missions are, the significance of having been to Israel hits you even more once you get home."

According to Brian Bloom, a member of a recent UJA Family Mission, in December 2002, Israel is his holiday destination from now on.

"Israelis in the street asked what I was doing spending my holidays in Israel," says Bloom. "I told them that I've been to Israel 25 times, even during wars, and I felt I was more at risk of being mugged in downtown Miami than I was in Israel. I'll never stop going to Israel; it's far too important to me."

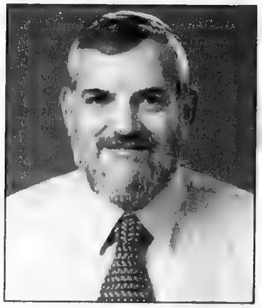
Toronto's Nathan Ladovsky with Jerusalem Mayor, Ehud Olmert on a recent mission.

Toddy Granovsky, who took part in the June 2003 Prime Minister's Mission, eloquently summed up why she feels these missions are so vital.

"My advice to anyone considering going on a solidarity mission to Israel is to do yourself, and Israel a favour, and go" says Granovsky, who took along her 91-year-old father in June. "To those of you not considering going on a mission please reconsider. I feel that going on a mission to Israel at this time is quite simply the best weapon civilians worldwide have to defeat terrorism. It will also be an experience that you will never forget."

Missions help to brighten future for Israeli tourism

With what he hopes were the worst of times finally behind Israel, Benny Elon, Israel's Minister of Tourism, can finally see a light at the end of Israel's tunnel.



Benny Elon,
Israel's Minister of Tourism

"Finally things are getting better," says Elon. "It is not the Israelis alone who learned to live with the current situation, but also the tourists. Tourism from abroad this July was 54% higher than last July. We are sure that the Jewish holiday season in October will bring with it more and more tourists."

Elon knows just how much of an impact UJA Federation missions have on the economy, and the people of Israel.

"The missions that arrived in Israel during the long period of war had a very important effect on Israel's society and economy," says Elon. "When tourism dropped sharply in October 2000, and then again in September 2001, there were two threads that kept the tourism industry alive: domestic Israeli tourism, and the missions from abroad that brought with them a message of solidarity and identification, which were very important to Israeli society, reminding Israelis that they are not alone."

A longtime strong advocate of promoting tourism to such areas as the Negev, Tiberias, and East Jerusalem, Elon is optimistic about Israeli tourism not merely surviving, but flourishing down the road.

"Israel is full of tourist attractions," says Elon. "East Jerusalem is not a unit in and of itself – it is Jerusalem, and no tourist nor resident crosses any border or even notices they have moved from "West" to "East" Jerusalem. Most of the archaeological and religious sites for Jews, Christians, and everyone with intellectual curiosity are in or near the Old City – including the Western Wall. The Negev is going through a new wave of creative development, and the Galilee has gained a tourism boost due to a nice rise, which we were blessed with this year, in the Sea of Galilee's water level and the new recognition of the city of Acre as a World Heritage Site."

Elon sees two factors as essential for the future of Israel's tourism industry.

"Other than the Jewish and Christian groups that visit Israel regularly, millions of other Jews and Christians which share the same friendship with Israel do not visit Israel regularly," explains Elon. "This is a huge and promising market that is the real hope for Israeli tourism."

Solidarity missions flourishing

The UJA Mission program continues to move forward at an unprecedented clip with a wide variety of upcoming missions to close out 2003.

The B'yachad Mission in November - one of the most ambitious missions of the year – has already been filled to capacity with close to 300 eager participants, and a waiting list.

"It's been wonderful to watch Toronto's Jewish community respond to this mission over the past few weeks," says Michael Buckstein, Chair of the mission along with Barry Zagdanski and Stephen Goldhar. "We needed to fill the last 80 seats in 10 days, and despite a series of terror attacks, Toronto came through as always. Toronto really understands that money is not always enough, that Israel needs our physical presence as well as our financial presence."

B'yachad will give hundreds of Torontonians and Canadians the opportunity to meet Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, to volunteer for a day, and to hear from journalists, military officials, and political leaders.

Another highly anticipated mission coming up this December is the Chanukah Family Mission, set for December 21 to January 2. More than 75 participants are expected to celebrate Chanukah in Israel.

"What an incredible opportunity this is, to spend Chanukah with your family where Chanukah should be celebrated," says Howard Kumer, Chair of the mission along with Ed Glina. "This will be the first organized mission that my family and I have ever been on. I'm taking my wife, two kids, and even my in-laws. Other than UJA Federation, it's tough to find any decent family missions to Israel. The itinerary is jam-packed and includes something for everybody. There's even going to be the opportunity for some of the participants to have their bar mitzvahs in Jerusalem."

Other 2003 UJA missions include the Toronto Israel Experience Centre's Adult Volunteer Mission slated for December 21 and the UJA Federation Medical Solidarity Mission from October 28 to November 4.

Old favourites in a new, delicious way

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

L'shanah tovah tikatevu – May you be inscribed for a good and sweet year! This familiar greeting will be exchanged as family and friends gather to celebrate the High Holy Days, beginning with Rosh Hashanah which starts at sundown on Sept. 26.

The holiday table is lavishly laid out with the delectable dishes that form part of each family's holiday traditions. Honey and apples are included in many dishes, symbolizing the wish for a sweet and healthy year. Challah, coiled into a round crown, is torn into chunks and dipped into honey.

The following recipes from two kosher cookbook authors feature special twists on contemporary traditions, preserving the special customs of the High Holy Days by preparing old favourites in new, delicious ways. It was extremely difficult to make my choices for this column. I hope these recipes will bring much pleasure to your holiday table!

If you are looking for the ultimate recipe for chopped liver, chef Jeffrey Nathan shares his secrets in Adventures in Jewish Cooking. Jeff says, "Rosh Hashanah comes only once a year. Enjoy and diet tomorrow!"

First, be sure to use lots of onions, and brown them well to bring out their sweetness. Also, serve your chopped liver with lots of garnishes so your guests can personalize each serving. This recipe brought raves from friends, who use apple brandy to symbolize sweetness for the New Year. Jeff also enjoys his Mom's vegetarian chopped liver, which combines roasted apples, cooked green beans, fried onions, hard-boiled eggs and crushed corn flakes.

JEFF NATHAN'S CLASSIC CHOPPED LIVER

1½ lb. chicken livers, well trimmed
⅓ cup vegetable oil
4 medium onions, finely diced
¼ cup brandy
6 large eggs, hard-boiled and halved
1 tsp. sugar
kosher salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste
Assorted crackers (matzah, lavash and other flatbreads) and breads, for serving
Additional garnishes: hard-boiled eggs (whites and yolks separated and chopped), chopped onion, schmaltz and gribenes, grated black radish, chopped fresh parsley

Position the rack 6 inches from the source of heat and preheat the broiler. Place the chicken livers on a lightly oiled broiler rack. Broil, turning once, until well done, about 5 minutes per side. Set aside.

Heat the oil in a large skillet over medium-high heat. Add the onions and cook, stirring occasionally, until deep golden brown, 8 to 10 minutes. Stir in the chicken livers. Pour in the brandy, and averting your face, ignite the brandy with a match. Let burn until the flame extinguishes, about 1 minute. Remove from the heat and cool slightly.

In batches, transfer the chicken liver mixture and eggs to a food processor, and pulse just until coarsely chopped. Do not overmix. Transfer to a large bowl. Stir in the sugar, and season with the salt and pepper. Cover tightly and refrigerate for at least 2 hours and up to 2 days to chill and blend the flavours.

Remove from the refrigerator about 1 hour before serving. Serve with the crackers and whatever condiments your family likes. Makes 12 servings.

She taught cooking classes and did catering until she made aliyah to Israel in 1984. Sue is the bi-weekly food columnist for Voices magazine and Hamodia, an English language newspaper distributed in Israel, the United States, Canada and parts of Europe.

Sue writes, "Biblical Chicken is my all-time favourite recipe for Rosh Hashanah and is also perfect for Shabbat or any festive holiday. Honey, almonds and raisins are simmered in a lightly spiced orange sauce – it's wonderfully fragrant and delicious." It comes from Simply Delicious (now out of print).

SUE EPSTEIN'S BIBLICAL CHICKEN

6 to 8 skinless boneless chicken breasts
2 tbsp. flour
1 tsp. salt
fresh ground pepper to taste
3 tbsp. oil
3 tbsp. margarine
1 cup blanched slivered almonds (optional)
⅔ cup orange juice
2 tsp. grated lemon rind
1¼ cups chicken stock
⅔ cup semi-dry white wine
1 tbsp. honey
2 small oranges, peeled, thinly sliced and the slices cut in half
½ cup white raisins

Preheat oven to 350. Sprinkle chicken breasts with flour, salt and pepper. Heat oil and margarine in a large frying pan and sauté almonds until golden. Remove and drain on paper towels. In the same fat, sauté chicken on both sides until golden brown. Remove chicken from the pan to a baking dish. Discard as much of the fat as possible without removing the brown bits in it. Add orange juice, lemon rind, chicken stock and wine; stir to incorporate any residue sticking to the pan. Stir in honey and bring to a boil. Simmer for 3 to 4 minutes.

Arrange chicken pieces side by side in baking dish and pour the sauce over it. Cover and bake for 20 minutes. Remove chicken from baking dish and transfer to a serving dish; arrange orange slices on top.

Cover and keep warm in a low oven or electric hot tray. Pour sauce into a small pan with lemon juice and raisins and bring to a boil. Simmer for 2 to 3 minutes, until thickened. Taste for seasoning if necessary, then pour sauce over the chicken. Sprinkle with almonds and serve. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

Easy sweet challah for a sweet year

By RIVKA TAL

As everyone knows, challah is the braided egg-rich loaf of bread that we traditionally eat on holidays and the Sabbath: two loaves of challah at each of the three Shabbat meals. They help commemorate the miracles that the Jewish people experienced during their 40 years of wandering in the desert. While on weekdays they received one portion of manna from heaven, on Friday God sent two portions.

Challah – especially homemade – is wonderful every week, but it resonates with deeper meaning at Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year, when it is an age-old custom to dip it in honey after reciting the appropriate blessing to beseech God for a sweet year.

For Rosh Hashanah, challah is often shaped into a crown or a turban, and raisins may be added to make it even sweeter. Throughout the whole holiday period – through the festival of Sukkot – many people prepare or buy round loaves instead of the traditional long, braided ones: a reminder of the cycle of life. Some very ambitious people add a braid in the centre in the shape of a ladder, in the fervent hope that we merit both physical and spiritual uplift during the coming year.

Challah, Fast n Festive meals for the Jewish Holidays, William Morrow & Co. publishers

The round challah custom is ideal for yours truly: I confess to being braid-impaired. While every preschool child in Israel seems to know how to form beautiful, even braids, I never learned this in Minnesota. Even my three-part braids (I have rarely attempted anything like six or more braids) leave a little to be desired.

My solution? Round challahs. They always come out nicely, they look impressive, and no one can believe how easy they are to make. You can either make one long braid and then roll it up, or use the following recipe and baking method.

The smell is indescribable. For more details on challah – actually on all aspects of bread baking – see any Jewish cookbook. All the myriad details won't fit into this article. According to Jewish law, the mitzvah of separation of challah must be observed – consult a rabbi for details.

Challah should be allowed to cool completely before being wrapped well for storage. Well-sealed challah can be stored for a day or so on the shelf, or frozen. It defrosts well, and no one can tell that it's not freshly baked.

You can even freeze the ready-to-bake dough. This is good to know in the busy pre-holiday period. May this be a sweet year for the entire Jewish people!

SWEET ROUND CHALLAH

2 tbsp. instant dry yeast
$^3/_4$ cup sugar
$^3/_4$ cup oil
approximately 9 cups of flour (divided), sifted
1 tbsp. salt
5 eggs (divided)
2 cups warm water
$^1/_2$ cup golden raisins (optional) sesame seeds
poppy seeds

Combine instant yeast, sugar and oil in a large bowl. Stir in about 3 cups of flour; combine well. Add salt and 4 well-beaten eggs, one at a time. Add water and mix in well. Sift in enough flour, 2 cups at a time, to form a dough for kneading, beating well after each addition. Add raisins, if desired. Knead for 8 to 10 minutes, adding a bit more flour if necessary. Place dough in a greased bowl and turn to grease all sides. Cover with a damp cloth and allow to rise in a warm place until double in bulk — about $1^1/_2$-2 hours. Punch down, fold in sides, cover, and allow to rise for about another half hour.

Punch down. Divide dough in half. Spray two 8- or 9-inch pans with non-stick cooking spray (look for pans that are at least 3 inches high).

Form a ball of dough about $3^1/_2$ inches in diameter and place in centre of pan. Divide rest of dough into 8 even portions, form 8 balls of dough and surround center ball of dough. Repeat with remaining half of dough.

Cover pans and allow to rise in a warm place until doubled in bulk. Brush with beaten egg. Sprinkle both sesame and poppy seeds on the two middle balls. Sprinkle sesame and poppy seeds alternately on each of the 8 outside balls of each challah. Bake in a preheated 350 degree oven for 35 to 40 minutes until golden brown and challah sounds hollow when tapped on the bottom.

Remove from pans immediately and cool on a rack. Yield: 2 round challahs.

Education students learn about diversity at Auschwitz

By ALIZA LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

We picked the train tracks because they were symbolic of Auschwitz; because so many who came in never went out.

We lit our candles as Prof. Michael Brown began the K'el Maleh Rachamim, explaining that it was the traditional Jewish memorial prayer for the deceased.

We stood in silence after he finished, until Marek, a Polish-Canadian student at York University, stepped forward and asked the Christian students to join him in "Our Father." Carinna, a German Buddhist, offered a Buddhist meditation and Sanjee, a Hindu student at York, sang a Hindu hymn.

Thirty-one individuals, all speaking the language of humanity.

We went to learn, and we went to teach. The York University trip, officially called Learning from the Past, Teaching for the Future (TFTF) was designed by Prof.Brown and Prof. Mark Webber to teach education students from different backgrounds how to bring lessons from the Holocaust into their classrooms.

TFTF was going to be a challenge. It wasn't just Jews. It wasn't just York students. York's contingent of 13 was met by a group of seven from Poland and a group of seven from Germany.

Twenty-seven students. Two Jews.

When we went to Friday night prayers in Stuttgart the first Shabbat, I was inundated with questions. The girls wanted to know what page we were on. They asked me what the men were wearing. They asked what the paintings on the wall meant. They sat when I sat. They stood when I stood. I had never experienced a Shabbat quite like it.

For days I had been living in someone else's world. Now it was time for others to venture into mine.

Matthias Hass, our Berlin educator, explained that the trip was asking us all a question: what is it like to be in the minority in society?

We lived that question on the field study – Sara Manly and I often felt like we were in the minority because we were the only Jews. The non-Jewish students often felt out-of-place at Jewish services or sites. The Canadians didn't speak Polish or German, the languages of our host countries. The Poles and Germans sometimes had tremendous difficulty with the language barrier, as the entire trip was officially in English.

Apparently, this collective feeling of being uncomfortable in our surroundings was one of the objectives. Everybody had to be an outsider sometimes. That way, no one had the upper hand.

Somehow, it worked. The one thing that I noticed was that always, no matter how late it was, no matter how tired we were, no matter how difficult the day's agenda had been, there was always a palpable desire by everyone to be considerate of all the little things that made us different.

Maybe we were here to do a university course, but the university wasn't what created the atmosphere of tolerance that we had. It was each person's individual commitment to making the world a better place – or what we Jews call tikkun olam.

I remember how Ivi Trabka's voice wavered when she told me about her feelings in seeing the museum in Auschwitz. For the 23-year-old student of the Pedagogical Academy in Krakow, the most powerful exhibit was not the mounds of hair or the piles of shoes, glasses and suitcases.

For Ivi, the dishes did it.

"The guide said all the Jewish moms thought they would cook for their families there. I started to think about my mother and realized that she would take this stuff too."

We went to teach about the Holocaust, and ran into an interesting problem. How do we teach about a time of fear and evil and hate, without becoming paranoid and hateful ourselves?

The answer rang out loud and clear every time one of us helped another for no apparent reason. It became clear every time we laughed together, every time we cried together, every moment we shared talking, trying to find a common ground.

People are really more the same than we are different. We all share a bit of the divine – the unquenchable spirit of humanity. We may not speak the same language, eat the same food or pray to the same God – nonetheless, our hearts understand each other.

Aliza Libman is a Jewish Education student at York University and serves as the managing editor of Afterword.

An open letter to Foreign Minister Bill Graham

From: Carolyn Bennett, MP St. Paul's; Anita Neville, MP, Winnipeg South Centre; Richard Marceau, MP, Charlesbourg-Jacques Cartier

To: Bill Graham

From left: MPs Carolyn Bennett, Richard Marceau and Anita Neville.

As members of the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group, we have consistently heard from Israeli diplomats and politicians that Canada is Israel's second best friend in the world. From Labor party leader Shimon Peres to Haim Divon, Israel's ambassador to Canada, we know that Israel has been grateful for our support and for our ability to build bridges.

Guest Voice

But there is also a great deal of room for improvement. We know that Canada can be an even better friend to Israel. Our voting record at the United Nations and our tardiness in recognizing Hezbollah as a terrorist organization has angered and disappointed many of Canada's Jewish community and Israel's friends. In order to help determine what specific things Canada could do to enhance Israel's prospects for peace and security, Richard Marceau MP suggested that a group of us from the Parliamentary Friendship Group visit Israel's closest ally, the United States.

At the end of the Parliamentary session, we travelled to Washington, D.C., on a fact-finding mission. In a jam-packed two days, we met with many officials and made a special trip to the United Stated Holocaust Memorial Museum, organized by Canadian Jewish Congress. David Cooper from the Canada-Israel Committee accompanied us and was particularly helpful in organizing meetings with Israel's ambassador to the United States, Daniel Ayalon, and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC).

It became clear from our meetings that there are four ways Canada can use its reputation for fairness and multilateralism to make a positive and substantive contribution to peace and to Israel's security.

• Support Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas

Most of the officials we met with viewed the election of Mahmoud Abbas as a positive step toward peace. Few believe that Abbas is a perfect partner in the peace process. Yet he has shown a commitment to a non-violent path, and an interest in peace shared by few other leaders within the Palestinian Authority (PA).

But Abbas faces many impediments: he enjoys little popular support and his control of the PA's security services is incomplete. His position is far from secure, as recent events have demonstrated.

We can strengthen Abbas' position in several ways. Firstly, we can recognize him as the primary representative of the Palestinian people in international forums and during state visits. These actions will help enhance his prestige internationally, thereby bolstering his domestic credibility. In turn, we should work to undermine international recognition of PA President Yasser Arafat. His recent, and potentially ongoing, complicity in acts of terror have reaffirmed that he is not a credible partner in the peace process.

• Undermine support for terror

Secondly, we can create a viable social safety network for the Palestinian people. The failure of the PA to provide sufficient social services has allowed organizations such as Hamas to fill the void. Their provision of schooling, health care and general social assistance has allowed it to gain popular support and has given the group a fertile recruiting ground. No one should forget, however, that Hamas' long-term goal is Israel's destruction, and that its means to this end is a campaign of terror. Hamas made this outlook clear on Aug. 19, when they ended a seven-week truce with Israel by blowing up a bus filled with civilians. Canada has been a long-time proponent of Israel's need for security. By ensuring that Palestinians receive social services from the PA, we can undermine popular support for Hamas and enhance the PA's credibility.

During our meetings, there was a consensus that Canada must continue to provide funding to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA). The people we spoke with felt that holding back those dollars would be counterproductive to ensuring stability in the region, and to Israel's security. But we maintain that we must ensure better accountability and transparency of the Canadian contribution to UNRWA.

Columnist offers simplistic solutions

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

Naomi Klein's column, "Bush's war goes global" (Globe and Mail, Aug. 27), is a model of mushy, left-wing thinking about terrorism in general, which zeroes in on Israel in particular.

Klein uses U.S. President George W. Bush's war on terrorism as fodder for her own attack on the U.S.-dominated globalization campaign, including its supposed control of the World Trade Organization (WTO). She cutely gives the war on terrorism a brand name: "WoTtm."

"The war on terrorism," Klein writes, is "a kind of brand, an idea that can be easily franchised by any government in the market for an all-purpose, opposition cleanser… [The war on terrorism] can be used on any liberation or opposition movement."

Klein's self-consciously hip wordplay may appeal to those already sympathetic to her anti-U.S., anti-globalization message. But examined up close, her argument is surprisingly superficial. Klein divides the world into the malevolent, oppressive forces of the Bush-led United States and its franchise agents – Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon first among them – who prey on the innocent, oppressed Third World liberationists.

In Israel's case, Sharon has "parroted" Bush's call to "'smash [al-Qaeda's] terrorist infrastructure'" and "sent bulldozers into the occupied territories to uproot olive trees, and tanks to raze civilian houses."

Israel is made to appear wantonly brutal, a mammoth violator of the human rights of Palestinians and foreigners, including journalists.

But Klein fails to provide any context. For example, she neglects the fact that over the past three years, suicide bombings have murdered nearly 1,000 Israelis and maimed thousands more, mostly Israeli civilians, including many women and children. So Israel, under Sharon, has tried to strike back with unexpected moderation. And still it has tried the path of negotiation with Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas.

However, Klein implies that Israel, among other countries that have adopted the war on terror philosophy, has made no effort to negotiate: "Why negotiate with your political opponents when you can annihilate them?" she writes, ignoring the fact that terrorist groups like Hamas are fanatically driven, and not interested in negotiations or compromise. Hamas and Islamic Jihad are committed to "liberating" all of Palestine by destroying Israel and establishing a rigid Islamic state in the entire region, a regime that tramples on women's rights, gay rights and other civil rights – in short on all forms of human rights.

Why does Klein, who so admirably supports human rights and social justice, basically excuse terrorist organizations that are antithetical to these very values? Why is she so concerned about those who seek the slaughter of civilians as a matter of policy? Why does she chastise Israel so severely, the one country in the Middle East that does respect human rights? Why would Klein so casually lump democratic Israel together with such disparate, excessive regimes as those in Indonesia and Colombia?

Klein's analysis, if one may call it that, is extremely simplistic. The one valid element is her note of caution, applicable in only some of her examples: governments that pursue terrorists must not use their operations as an excuse to abuse human rights and human dignity.

But Klein totally ignores real cases of oppression in the name of combating terror. She neglects to mention Cuba, which recently summarily jailed 75 peaceful dissidents, branding them "terroristas." Indeed, she criticizes only emerging and established democracies. Absolved are all the terror-supporting tyrannies, dictatorships and regimes that lie outside the orb of the real "enemy" of liberation: the United States and its globalizing, capitalist henchmen.

Letter from three MPs

• Pressure France and Europe on terror groups

Thirdly, we need to lobby against organizations whose acts of terror undermine the peace process. While the military wings of terrorist groups such as Hamas and Hezbollah have been banned in many parts of the world, their political wings often retain legality. A false dichotomy has been drawn between political wings that raise funds and organize, and military wings that carry out acts of violence. The humanitarian efforts that these groups engage in have further blurred the issue of their complicity in acts of terror. Canada has made similar mistakes, but it's time that we address the problem. We need to lobby our friends and allies to end their legal sanction of these groups. In particular, we need to target France's failure to deem Hamas a terrorist group. Their intransigence has prevented a blanket ban on the organization throughout the EU. If we succeed in our efforts, we can shut down the support networks that fuel the region's terrorist activity.

•Promote democracy

Finally, we need to work to promote democracy in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Les Campbell of the National Democratic Institute argues that the failure of the Oslo peace initiatives was that they rested solely on Arafat. When he proved unco-operative, there was nowhere for the peace process to go. The same mistake should not be made twice. Abbas cannot be Israel's only partner in the process. The PA needs engage in broad democratic institution building, with Canada's support. Fatah must learn to how to transform itself from a "revolutionary movement" to a political party. The Palestinian people need to believe they have other outlets for their dissent besides violence. Non-violence must be the only acceptable path. The opening up of a democratic dialogue will provide more potential partners in the peace process. If the Abbas option fails, there will be a variety of new leaders we can turn to.

Moreover, we need to recognize that if the Palestinian people do not have a role in the peace process, they will view its outcome as illegitimate. An enduring peace can only come out of a process that the Palestinian people feel they have ownership of. Only then will they be willing to co-exist in peace with Israel.

In the wake of the recent terror attacks, peace may seem further off, but for the sake of Israel and the Palestinians, the violence needs to end. Canada has a role to play in laying the foundations for peace. We can use our credibility in international forums and our expertise in humanitarian organizations and democracy to help make the necessary changes. Most of these measures are not specific to the road map peace plan. As a friend of Israel, Canada should always pursue policies that improve Israel's security, that disempower groups that pursue violence and that make the PA a more fertile ground for democracy and peace.

Rabbis question MK policy

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Several prominent Orthodox Montreal rabbis are questioning a policy of the city's kashrut authority that bars imported kosher fresh meat and poultry from butchers and grocery departments operating under the "MK" (Montreal Kosher) hechsher, because they say the policy limits competition and keeps prices high.

Rabbi Saul Emanuel, the executive director of the Vaad Ha'ir, defended its practice of refusing an MK certification to imported fresh meat and poultry, citing historical reasons and the need to preserve the integrity of a rigorous kashrut process.

He also insisted prices of kosher meat and poultry in Montreal are generally comparable to – and in some instances cheaper – than those in other North American cities.

That view, however, is rejected by Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz, president of the Rabbinical Council of Canada's (RCC) eastern region, Rabbi Reuben Poupko of the Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation and Rabbi Yonah Rosner, a former RCC president and spiritual leader of the Shomrim Laboker Synagogue.

They said the local "closed market" benefits producers, not consumers. The absence of outside kosher meat and poultry suppliers, they said, keeps prices in Montreal exorbitantly high, compelling many Jews who would otherwise keep kosher at home to purchase non-kosher alternatives.

"It's absurd," said Rabbi Steinmetz.

While hailing the "exceptional job" done by the Vaad in rigorously enforcing halachic standards, Rabbi Steinmetz, spiritual leader of the Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue, described the Vaad importation policy as "antiquated."

Rabbi Rosner said many young people, as well as pensioners who have kept kosher at home their whole lives, are buying non-kosher meat and poultry because of the "prohibitive" price of the kosher equivalent. He feared this will produce a generation of Jews who reach middle age without keeping kosher at home.

"It tears my heart out," he said. "The consumption in Montreal [of kosher meat and poultry] has gone down, down, down. I know the [Montreal Jewish] population has gone down too, but it is still 90,000."

Rabbi Rosner also noted that some local shochtim (slaughterers) now seek work in Toronto because of the closure of local abattoirs.

According to Rabbi Emanuel and the Young Israel of Montreal's Rabbi Harry Kaufman, a member of the Beth Din who also spoke to The CJN, the Vaad policy dates back to the Jewish experience in Europe, where Jewish communities barred imported kosher meats to protect the jobs of local kosher butchers, slaughterers and mashgichim, as well as to ensure the continuity of supply and guarantee the kosher meat and poultry available for sale fulfilled halachic criteria and could be trusted.

But Rabbi Poupko said Montreal remains the only city in North America with a significant Jewish population where imported kosher meat and poultry from credible kosher suppliers can't be found in local kosher butcher shops or the kosher sections of grocery store chains because the Vaad won't allow it.

"My question is this: What is it the Vaad Ha'ir knows about kosher meat that the rabbis of Toronto, Chicago, New York, and Miami don't know?" he asked.

"Anyone who's taken Economics 101 knows that a closed market benefits producers, not consumers. So whose interests do they serve? A handful of producers, or the kosher consumers of Montreal?

"Everyone knows that the greatest obstacle to kashrut observance is the cost. By maintaining a closed market, the Vaad Ha'ir is a co-conspirator in discouraging kashrut observance," Rabbi Poupko said.

"Everyone knows that kosher meat is cheaper almost everywhere else."

A quick check of kosher lean ground beef prices between Montreal and Toronto seemed to bear Rabbi Poupko out: late last month, the Loblaws store in St. Laurent was charging $7.54 a pound for Levitt's lean ground beef, and $5.80 for the Continental brand.

In Toronto, at the Loblaws at Forest Hill Market, the price for a pound of kosher lean ground beef was $4.59.

Poultry prices, by contrast, seemed comparable: the Loblaws at Bayview and Sheppard avenues in Toronto, a meat department spokesperson said, was charging "$7 or $8" a kilogram ($3.18 and $3.64 per pound) for a whole Chai-brand kosher chicken, a label not available in Montreal.

The Metro store in the Snowdon district of Montreal was charging $3.18 per pound for a Marvid's kosher chicken.

But Rabbi Rosner said he saw kosher chicken filets selling for almost $10 a pound at IGA, a price he considered exorbitant.

Several kosher departments contacted for this article would not reveal prices over the phone, saying they were told not to do so.

Rabbi Emanuel said that while discrepancies might exist between cities on a given day, prices tend to equal out over time. Even though imported meat and chicken are not available for sale at MK-certified establishments, he said a certain level of competitive pricing exists among Montreal producers and even among individual butcher shops.

Moreover, Rabbi Emanuel said, Montreal prices would not necessarily be cheaper even if the Vaad theoretically allowed U.S.-imported kosher meat and poultry because of current exchange rates.

Rabbi Kaufman feared that if the huge kosher suppliers from the United States were allowed into Montreal, that would push local prices higher by putting them into a position of "monopoly control."

Rabbi Rosner said he does not directly fault the Vaad for the current situation. He said Montreal's mainstream rabbis should have addressed this issue long ago.

"The [haredim] have their own hechshers, so it's the general Montreal Jewish constituency which is affected by this policy. The Vaad should not be blamed if we haven't stood up to them."

Rabbi Rosner felt a compromise could be reached by allowing imported kosher meat into Montreal while placing a small surcharge on

Rabbi Emanuel said he does not question the kashrut of imported meats. But he said Jewish consumers have not suffered from the Vaad's policy, since changing it would not affect prices.

Isadore Black was a leader in Peterborough community

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Obituary

Isadore Black, a businessman and stalwart of the Peterborough community, died Aug. 28. He was 88.

Black was born in Peterborough in 1915, in the apartment above the family store, his son Martin told The CJN. At the age of 16, he opened his first store, which sold menswear.

At the time, Martin said, Isadore's father, Philip, who was also the first rabbi of the city, operated a dry goods store. Eventually, the two stores merged, and Isadore was involved with the business until 1989.

He took his responsibilities to the community seriously. He believed good citizens look after their family. The rest follows naturally. If you look after your family, he felt, you want to help your community for selfish reasons. You want a better city and country for your family to live in.

Black spearheaded the Peterborough Rotary Club's Patriotic Day campaign with a Canada Day essay program that attracted more than 800 entries from local schools. He founded a breakfast program for Prince Edward Elementary School, which he had attended, was a volunteer member of the Trillium Foundation, and was active in the formation and activities of the seniors' committee for the seven counties surrounding Peterborough.

He served as president of the Rotary club of Peterborough, the Peterborough Downtown Business Improvement Area, the Chamber of Commerce and was on the board of directors of the YMCA and St. Joseph Hospital.

Black was a founding member of the board of governors of Trent University, and worked for it enthusiastically. Together with other family members, he established the Philip and Annie C. Black Bursary. Now his family has established a memorial fund in his name. In honour of his contributions to the university, the flag above the Bata Library was lowered to half-mast.

Black was deeply committed to Jewish causes as well, working for Israel Bonds for more than 50 years, BoysTown Jerusalem, the Ponevez Yeshiva in New York and Israel, B'nai Brith Canada, of which he was president, and his synagogue, Beth Israel.

Martin Black said that of all his activities, his father "got the most enjoyment out of his shul activities – the davening, the shiurim, just being there."

Other causes and organizations he was involved in include the Salvation Army Hamper Fund, the Peterborough Disaster Fund, Masons and Oddfellows.

He also received many honours, including the Paul Harris Fellowship Award from the Rotary Club of Peterborough; citizen of the year by the Greater Peterborough Chamber of Commerce; the Distinguished Founders Award from the Ponevez Yeshiva in New York and Israel; the Queen's Medal for volunteerism in 1992, which commemorated Canada's 125th birthday; and the Queen's Jubilee Medal in 2003, also for volunteerism.

In addition, Black was involved in lawn bowling, for which he established an annual tournament, as well as curling and euchre.

He is survived by his wife, Belle, his daughter Shelley and her husband Charles Hodgkinson, his son Philip and his wife Candy, his son Martin and his wife Ellie, his son David and his wife Kim, and eight grandchildren.

Toronto filmmakers show a lot of chutzpah

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

For filmmakers, the "Eureka!" moment can strike anytime. For Igal Hecht, it hit him soon after a trip to a Thornhill, Ont. doughnut shop, where he noticed Israelis socializing at tables apart from Canadian Jews. They were each mocking the other, and Hecht watched the two sides carefully.

Later that night, at around 3 a.m., Hecht couldn't sleep. He typed a film synopsis focusing on tensions between Israelis and Diaspora Jews, and he then called his production partner Ron Furman and said, "Listen, we have to make this film."

Three years later, and the documentary Y.I.D. (Yehudeem in Diaspora) catapulted into festivals and Jewish communities. Its premier screening sold out last January and it sold out at last year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Y.I.D. is being considered by a national broadcaster for a 45-minute version to be released in a few months. And due to popular demand, a sequel will wrap up post-production in December.

Ron Furman co-founded Chutzpa Productions in 1999.

Hecht, 25, says his company Chutzpa Productions — formed with 24-year-old Furman in 1999 — is praised for its ability to "show Judaism's beauty and ugliness." Y.I.D. exemplifies that mission: one scene portrays North York Jews extolling Israel's richness, while another frames Israeli bitterness over Diaspora's supposed lack of support for Israel.

To Hecht and Furman (writer/director and producer, respectively), it all comes down to displaying Israel and her people in a light that is too harsh for some.

"Some people don't like what we do but all we say is 'Too bad,'" Hecht remarks. Furman sees their chutzpah as more appreciative than muck-raking. "We're helping our community with these films, we're paying it forward."

Chutzpa Productions began by paying out of their pockets, but the two filmmakers recall those days as both gritty and rewarding. One of their earliest films Camels of Nahor — a self-financed fictional tale à la Romeo and Juliet about a Reform boy seeking the hand of a rabbi's daughter — screened at the New York International Film and Video Festival.

The documentary Protest is their recent close-up of on-campus politics, zeroing in on what Jewish and Arab students face at York University, and highlighting what Hecht calls "a big problem of trust"; Parted — screening at Toronto's Royal Cinema Oct. 3 and 4 — examines what two separated brothers face when an ocean divides a family; and The Chosen People — a look into Messianic Judaism premiering at the 2004 Toronto Jewish Film Festival — reprises Chutzpa's tendency to raise questions rather than answer them.

"If we don't do these films, no one else will," says Hecht, whose love of film marries his love of Judaism in almost every scene he touches. Hecht's affinity is hewn from his homeland — he emigrated from Israel at 12-years-old — and Furman, born in Haifa, is also an expressive lover of all things Israeli. That passion can be dangerous, though, since attachment can taint perspective.

"But what films are 100 per cent objective?" Hecht asks rhetorically. A look at Bowling for Columbine and Violence At Concordia proves his point.Their guerilla interviewing tactics, as in-your-face as Nick Broomfield or Michael Moore, speak a language that says, "We're shooting this, whether you like it or not."

Hecht credits the film program at Seneca Collegiate for instilling unforgettable education while Furman acknowledges his acting and theatre background.

Hecht and Furman are excited when they speak about their upcoming films, although they both spend countless hours editing and co-ordinating interviews and networking with broadcast execs. But, as their religion has taught them, great reward comes from perseverance.

An eight-minute version of Protest ran on VisionTV several months ago and will likely air on a big-time network next year; and Y.I.D. 2 is shaping up to be, in Hecht's words, "a fascinating doc on what Israelis think about Diaspora Jews."

n't care. thanks

Igal Hecht on the set of one of his films.

All Hamas leaders a target

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

"Up to what level do you plan to raise this wave of assassinations?" a senior Israel Defence Forces General Staff officer was asked last week. "Of course, there's no way you intend to assassinate [Hamas founder] Sheikh Yassin."

This senior IDF officer, who has a reputation for reliability, simply refused to respond to the question.

The reason for his silence became abundantly clear last Saturday. This time around, Israel intended to do exactly what it said it would. The entire Hamas leadership has been targeted – and, in addition to Yassin, this includes the organization's top brass in Damascus. The failed strike against Yassin and a group of other top Hamas men last Saturday doesn't alter this policy.

Israel's assassinations policy was resumed a little more than two weeks ago, as a result of the terrorist attack in Jerusalem. But events of the past two weeks do not tell the whole story. The policy's scope can only be fully understood by reviewing actions taken over the past year.

Out of seven prominent Hamas leaders in the Gaza Strip, three (Salah Shahada, Ibrahim Maqadmeh and Ismail Abu Shanab) have been killed since July 2002. Two were lightly hurt in assassination strikes (Yassin last Saturday and Abdel Aziz Rantisi in June). One escaped injury in an attack (Ismail Haniya last Saturday). And only one, Mahmoud a-Zahar, has not yet been targeted in an attack, at least not to date.

Though world attention focused last Saturday on Ramallah, where the Palestinian Authority political leadership was put in turmoil by Mahmoud Abbas' resignation as prime minister, a major showdown between Hamas and Israel is now taking place in Gaza. The decision reached by Israel's government to wage "fierce war" against the militant Islamic organization stems partly from an estimate that Hamas is currently mired in a genuine crisis.

Last week, IDF General Staff officers cited six types of pressure that are being exerted concurrently on the Hamas leadership: the direct threat to the lives of the Hamas leaders; full American support for the assassinations; the European Union decision to declare Hamas' political wing a terrorist organization (a development that has particularly troubled Yassin); the PA's confiscation of $3 million that sources overseas tried to transfer to Hamas; the refusal of Abbas (before his resignation) to renew the hudna; and public criticism in the territories about damage caused by the renewal of terror strikes.

This network of pressures caused Hamas leaders to consider the possibility of bringing a halt to terrorist attacks, despite the desire to sponsor reprisals against Israel for the assassinations.

A few days ago, the Hamas leadership in Gaza deliberated about advocating a policy of abstaining from large-scale terrorist attacks inside the Green Line, but even as the Gaza leaders mulled over this policy, members of Hamas' military wing on the West Bank continued to prepare for terrorist strikes inside Israel, no mat[illegible] what Sheikh Yassin and his Gaza associates decide.

The decision to order the attack in Gaza City was reached by Israel's political leadership last Saturday morning, after it received intelligence information about the meeting of Hamas leaders in a Gaza City apartment belonging to a lecturer in the city's Islamic College. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon personally approved the strike.

A senior Israeli security source said Saturday night that the aim was to liquidate the group of Hamas leaders, and not just Yassin. It appears that this objective was[illegible]ot met because the Hamas men were located at the time on the building's first floor, and not its third floor as the IDF believed, and because Israel used a one-quarter-ton bomb – an explosive significantly lighter than the one-ton bomb used to kill Shahada in July 2002.

In other words, Israel wanted to attack the Hamas leadership, but it refrained from using the weapons needed to guarantee a decisive result.

Jewish Libyan heritage

The 21 portraits were chosen out of more than 1,800 pictures, sent in anonymously by members of the community. None are identified by name, location or year – a deliberate decision taken by museum director Avi Pedatzur.

"The faces in the pictures are meant to tell the story of the community," Pedatzur says. "I want everyone to be able to identify with the pictures, and to use their imaginations."

Indeed, the pictures reflect the rich history and diversity of Libyan Jews. The community dates back to the time of the Second Temple, but it grew between the 16th and 19th centuries, with the influx of Jews from Spain, Italy, Tunisia and Algeria, who lived under Ottoman rule. In 1911, the Italians invaded, and while initially the community modernized and flourished under their rule – establishing many Zionist institutions and youth groups, for example – the Jews were hurt when Italy joined World War II. Italy's race laws were enforced, and many families were expelled to Tunisia and Italy; 562 Jews were killed in the Giado concentration camp.

In 1943, the British freed Libya, and the community was re-established. But two years later, Arab riots forced many young Jews to flee again. By 1952, only 10 per cent of the 35,000-strong community remained. And when 17 Jews were killed in further Arab riots in June 1967, even that 10 per cent left.

The majority of the pictures in the "Faces Tell The Story" exhibit date from the late 19th to the mid-20th century. Pedatzur says many are official portraits taken in a photographer's studio, an unfamiliar and perhaps uncomfortable setting for many poor Jewish families. In one picture, he points out, the children's eyes are wide with fear; in another, a young boy's underwear has fallen to the ground, though no one noticed.

The only picture with a known identity is that of a blind man: Arbib's father, Umberto Nissim Arbib, to whom the exhibition is dedicated.

"When we left Libya, we could not take my father's remains with us," says Arbib. "I wanted to do something for him."

His family was one of the few to remain in Libya until 1967. Arbib – who was actually born in Tunisia, where the family had fled in World War II – recalls a warm Jewish childhood in Tripoli, centred around the synagogue.

"I remember it like it was yesterday," he says.

As a teenager, he divided his time between Tripoli and Italy, where he studied, and the family fled to Israel when Arbib was 26. He worked in a travel agency there, and in 1987, he emigrated to Toronto, where he lives with Canadian wife, Edie, and is CEO of the Skylink Group, which provides international charter flights on demand.

Arbib estimates there are only five or six Jewish-Libyan families in Toronto, but retains ties to his native land through the city's Italian community. He has never been back to visit Libya, but says he would like to.

"Just last month, I saw pictures of our old house there," he says. "It was in very bad shape."

Still, Arbib has long been involved in Jewish-Libyan causes through the World Organization of Libyan Jews. One of their next projects: demanding restitution from the Libyan government for lost Jewish property.

"The whole worlds talks of what the Arabs left behind in Palestine, but no one talks about what the Jews left behind in Arab lands," he says. "It is important to balance their claims."

Ultimately, though, he would like to become more involved with projects like the museum. Most people – Jews and non-Jews alike – still find the idea of a Libyan Jew strange, he says: "When I say I'm from Libya, the first reaction is always: [Libyan leader Moammar] Gadhafi? No one knows our history, which is why we need to make our place in Jewish history clearer."

In its Sept. 25 issue, The CJN will be publishing a special supplement on Jews from Arab countries, which will include an article about Walter Arbib's experiences in Libya.

: The "Faces Tell The Story" exhibit, which opened late last month at the Center for the Heritage of Libyan Jews in Or Yehuda, is not the first Canadian contribution to the working-class town. Indeed, Canada has quite a presence there.

According to mayor Yitzhak Buhabza, between 1980 and 1993, Canadian Jews invested more than $15 million in Or Yehuda. As part of Project Renewal, they helped build, among other things, its sports centre, cultural centre, a day-care centre and boarding school. They sponsored extra classes for children in need, and today still award special student scholarships.

"Of 100 areas involved in the project, ours showed the most progress," says Buhabza. "We were the flagship."

It is no surprise, then, that one of the main streets in Or Yehuda is called "Canadian Jewry Road."

Buhabza, himself a Libyan Jew, says he hopes that Walter Arbib's contribution to the Center for the Heritage of Libyan Jews will help draw more visitors to the museum, which already draws thousands of guests a year, including many schoolchildren.

"Libyan Jewry was only a small community, in an out-of-the-way place, but we learned the secret of survival," he says. "That's something we must pass on to our children."

As a town, he adds, "We want to continue developing ties with Canadian Jewry. I hope Walter's donation will strengthen the connection."

Qureia: Israel must end killings

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Ahmed Qureia, the speaker of the Palestinian parliament tapped by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat to take over as prime minister after the resignation last Saturday of Mahmoud Abbas, laid out his terms Monday for accepting the post.

Qureia said he would not be able to govern without Arafat's support, and said Israel must change its approach to the PA president. Israel and the United States want to sideline Arafat, who has been confined to his West Bank headquarters for over 18 months.

The speaker said he wants real support from the international community, "practical, not by words," echoing complaints by Abbas who, in listing the reasons for his resignation, said the United States had not done enough to enforce Israeli compliance with the internationally brokered road map for Middle East peace.

"I don't want to see more [Israeli] military checkpoints. I don't want to see assassination of Palestinians. I don't want to see the demolishing of houses," Qureia said, adding that he would try to negotiate a ceasefire with Israel.

Qureia also said he would only accept the job if Washington and Europe guarantee Israeli compliance with the road map.

"I am not prime minister as yet… I want to see the Americans – what kind of guarantee… they will [give]," he told Reuters from his office in Abu Dis, near Jerusalem.

"I want to see Europe, what kind of guarantees and support… they will [give]. I'm not ready for failure. I want to see whether peace is possible or not."

In response, an EU spokesperson said Monday that Qureia is highly respected by the European Union and can count on the 15-nation bloc's support.

"He is a man who believes in peace with Israel and he has done a lot for that," said Cristina Gallach, spokesperson for EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana.

The Week in Israel

Sept. 1

- Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon said Israel is prepared to launch a ground offensive into Gaza if the Palestinians continue to launch rockets into Israel. He made the remarks after missiles were fired into Ashkelon the week before.

Sept. 2

- Israel may need to expel Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, defence minister Shaul Mofaz said. "Arafat never wanted to reach an agreement with us," Mofaz said, and thus Israel erred in not expelling him when his true intentions became clear.

Sept. 3

- Eighty-three per cent of Israelis are satisfied with their lives, according to a poll conducted by the Central Bureau of Statistics. The poll surveyed some 7,000 Israelis 20 years of age and older. Fifty-three per cent were optimistic about the future, while 14 per cent were pessimistic.

Sept. 4

- Army Sgt. Gabriel Uziel, 20, was killed in an ambush shooting in Jenin. The Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades claimed responsibility.

Sept. 5

- Sgt. Maj. Ra'anan Komemi, 23, a member of the Israel Defence Forces' elite naval commando unit, was killed in an early morning clash with armed Palestinians in Nablus. Four other soldiers were wounded, one seriously. A senior Hamas bomb-maker, Mohammed Hanbali, who orchestrated several fatal suicide bombings and was responsible for dozens of Israeli deaths, was also killed in the clash.
- The number of victims in the mid-August Jerusalem bus bombing rose to 22 when Netanya resident Mordechai Laufer, 27, died from his wounds.

Israel tries to halt critical UN resolutions

By SHLOMO SHAMIR

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Israel has launched a campaign to get the United Nations to declare a moratorium on all resolutions that denounce Israel or demand that it issue parallel denunciations or demands regarding Palestinian terrorism.

Israel's ambassador to the UN, Danny Gillerman, presented the idea last week at a special meeting with UN ambassadors from 25 European states who either are, or are slated to become, members of the European Union.

Gillerman was accompanied by David Granit, the Foreign Ministry's deputy director-general for international organizations, who flew in from Jerusalem for the meeting.

Israel is arguing that a moratorium on one-sided anti-Israel resolutions is required by the road map peace plan, of which the EU and the UN are co-sponsors, along with the United States and Russia. The road map calls for an end to anti-Israel incitement.

A UN source told Ha'aretz that the European diplomats were surprised by the proposal and declined to respond immediately, and Israeli officials refused to speculate on the likelihood that they will ultimately accede.

But Gillerman plans to continue pushing the issue in individual talks with key UN players in the time remaining until the start of the UN's next session on Sept. 16. He and Granit met last week with the UN ambassadors from Denmark and India.

Israel also planned to raise the idea in meetings with senior U.S. State Department officials in Washington, D.C., this past weekend.

"We presented the Europeans with a challenge," Granit said. "The success of our meeting with the European ambassadors was that it took place at all."

The initiative refers specifically to 21 resolutions on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict that are discussed by various UN committees every year and then forwarded to the General Assembly, where they enjoy an automatic majority. Israel is proposing that the committees not discuss these resolutions this year and that the General Assembly postpone a vote on them until next year.

Until now, Israel has largely ignored these resolutions, assuming it is incapable of changing the UN's behaviour.

But Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom decided recently that Israel should make a concerted push to detach the European states from the General Assembly's anti-Israel majority. He also sent a letter to his colleagues in the EU urging them to correct the "distorted situation" created by the automatic anti-Israel majority.

Katsav holds phone-in with Iranian radio listeners

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's Iranian-born president has hosted an emotional radio talk show with listeners from his native country, even as Israeli and Iranian leaders have traded barbs recently over Iran's nuclear program.

The broadcast last week on the Persian service of Israel Radio paired President Moshe Katsav with listeners from all over Iran, service director Menashe Amir said.

Katsav chatted in a mix of Hebrew and Farsi with Iranian listeners who called in during last Monday's program, recalling his affinity for the country he left as a boy.

"My family lived in Iran for more than 2,500 years," he said. "We absorbed the Persian culture and mentality, and we nurture in our hearts very warm feelings for Iran's history and culture."

It was the first time Katsav has addressed Iranians on the radio since assuming the presidency in 2000. His comments and those of listeners, reported in Yediot Achronot, were confirmed by radio officials.

Israel Radio reaches more than 1 million listeners in Iran, Amir said.

Israel and Iran have been bitter enemies since Iran's 1979 Islamic revolution. Iran regards Israel as a consistent violator of Palestinian rights and has called for its destruction, while Israel says Iran supports terrorists and is pursuing a nuclear weapons program that threatens world peace.

Cronenberg film offbeat and unusual

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Two "Canadian" films that played at the Toronto International Film Festival last year have just been released on video and DVD.

Julie Walking Home is a Canadian, Polish and German co-production about a Catholic mother, Julie, and Jewish father, Henry, whose son contracts a terminal disease. The mother refuses to accept the medical prognosis and is willing to go anywhere and do anything in order to find a cure for her child.

Julie hears about a faith healer in Poland who is reputed to perform miracles. In desperation, she takes her son and begins following the healer.

Julie winds up being attracted by the faith healer's personal magnetism and before long she begins a torrid affair with the man and brings him home to Canada with her.

The story is built on several levels and deals with such themes as love, hope, faith and loyalty.

Director Agnieszka Holland has become world renowned as a writer/director of such films as Olivier, Olivier and Europa, Europa. The latter film is considered to be one of the best Holocaust films to have ever come out of Europe.

Julie Walking Home doesn't quite come up to those standards, but is an interesting film nonetheless.

Miranda Otto, the Australian actress who appeared as the warrior Eowyn in Lord of the Rings: The Two Towers, gives a powerful performance as the desperate mother determined to protect her child, no matter what the consequences. It also stars William Fichtner and Lothaire Bluteau.

My second choice is somewhat offbeat and a little unusual, but if you like a film that makes you think, then Spider is the film for you.

This is Canadian director David Cronenberg's latest production, and like many of his previous films, Spider will send a chill up your spine.

Basically, the film focuses on Dennis Cleg, a mental patient who has been discharged from custody and sent to a halfway house in London, England. It soon becomes clear that Dennis isn't quite ready to be released. He is still haunted by his childhood and the death of his mother.

From his flashbacks, we aren't completely certain whether the "facts" are as Dennis remembers them, or the invention of a tortured mind.

Ralph Fiennes gives an incredible performance as the struggling Dennis Cleg. He has very few lines and most of them are mumbled incomprehensibly.

But all of this fits the role perfectly and his body movements and shuffling of feet serve to increase the suspense and mystery.

Cronenberg, as usual, does a terrific job of bringing all the elements together. All the actors, including Miranda Richardson, Gabriel Byrne, Lynn Redgrave, John Neville and Bradley Hall, give restrained performances that are just right for the film, and Cronenberg seems to relish in slowly revealing the information that will eventually allow us to understand the film.

Surprisingly, Spider was not up for very many Genie awards, but it did win in the one major category where it was nominated — Best Director for Cronenberg's terrific work.

This may not be the kind of video you would pick for an evening of light entertainment. It is a dark film filled with some striking images, but it is certainly a thought provoking film that will stay with you for some time afterwards.

Both these films have been released on video and DVD by Alliance Atlantis and should be available at all major video stores. If your store doesn't carry these titles you should ask the manager to order them.

Several people have asked about the availability of the films I described in the past two columns — The Nazi Officer's Wife, Israel: A Nation Is Born and The Decalogue. The Nazi Officer's Wife is distributed by SMA Distribution (1-800-267-1216). Israel: A Nation Is Born and The Decalogue are distributed in Canada by Morningstar Entertainment (416-443-0202).

In the United States, The Decalogue is distributed by Facets Video which can be accessed on the internet at www.facets.org or by telephone at 1-773-281-9075. All videos described in this column can be ordered by individual stores or on the internet.

Unlikely Heroes: profiles of courage and resistance during the Holocaust

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jews resisted the Nazi juggernaut, as the 1943 Warsaw ghetto uprising shows.

But the brave, though doomed, Jewish fighters in Warsaw were not the only Jews in Nazi-occupied Europe to fight back.

Unlikely Heroes, a film from the Simon Wiesenthal Center, presents the stories of seven individuals who personify courage and heroism in the face of overwhelming odds.

A Moriah Films production directed by Richard Trank and narrated by Sir Ben Kingsley, this poignant two-hour movie had its world premiere in Toronto last week.

It was screened at a benefit at the Varsity Cinema under the auspices of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center.

Two of the seven special people profiled in Unlikely Heroes are Canadians – Anna Heilman of Ottawa and Leon Kahn of Vancouver.

They defied the Nazis by force of arms, but some of their fellow resisters fought oppression by indirect means.

Willy Perl, an Austrian Jew from Vienna, began organizing illegal transports of Jews to Palestine in 1937. His efforts were initially opposed by the Jewish community. But as the Nazi vise tightened, Perl's heroics were better appreciated.

Perl, a lawyer, was a fearless person. In 1938, following Germany's annexation of Austria, he met with SS representative Adolf Eichmann in Vienna to facilitate the emigration of Jews from Austria. During their meeting, Eichmann put a pistol to his back to pump him for information.

Unintimidated, Perl went over his head and negotiated a deal with Eichmann's superior to transport Jews to Palestine. All in all, Perl is credited with saving some 40,000 Austrian, Czech and Hungarian Jews. His widow, Lore, a Catholic convert to Judaism, relates part of his fantastic story.

After the murder of his family, Pinchas Rosenbaum of Hungary vowed he would avenge their deaths and rescue Jews. A rabbi's son and a member of a religious Zionist resistance organization known as Hatzellah, Rosenbaum escaped from a forced labour camp and wound up in Budapest, where he disguised himself as a government official and an Arrow Cross officer.

The Arrow Cross, a fiercely anti-Semitic militia, seized power in 1944 and stepped up the persecution of Jews.

Masquerading under these disguises, Rosenbaum rescued more than 1,000 Jews, many of them orphans, and 12 nuns who had helped Jews.

"He changed reality," says a childhood friend who compares him to Peter Pan.

Astonishingly enough, Rosenbaum was all of 21 when the war ended.

Recha Sternbuch, a devoutly Orthodox Jew whose father was a rabbi, lived in the Swiss town of St. Gallen.

Using her own funds, she brought hundreds of Jewish refugees to neutral Switzerland, sheltering about 30 in her own home.

She was also one of the first voices in Europe to alert the world of Germany's plan to exterminate European Jewry.

Interestingly enough, one of her allies was St. Gallen's police chief. In general, however, the Swiss authorities were upset by her rescue committee. Working from the assumption that it would imperil Switzerland's neutrality, the government had her arrested. She spent two weeks in prison before being released.

No shrinking violet, Sternbuch risked her life by crossing into Germany to save a Jewish family. Toward the end of the war, she cajoled a senior, pro-German Swiss official into persuading the Nazis to release several thousand Jews.

Leon Kahn, who witnessed the massacre of Jews in his Lithuanian town, joined a partisan band that hounded the German army in Lithuania, Poland and Belarus.

From bases in the deep forests of these countries, the guerrillas cut down power and phone lines, derailed trains and blew up bridges. Kahn specialized in laying mines. He remembers those days with relish.

But there was heartache, too. He regrets having left his mother behind, and he mourns the violent death of his sister and his father at the hands of the Home Army, a Polish partisan band.

Anna (Hanka) Heilman lived through the ghetto revolt in Warsaw and the horrors of the Majdanek concentration camp.

In Auschwitz-Birkenau, where she and her sister worked in a munitions factory, they were part of a plot to smuggle gunpowder to inmates planning an uprising.

The 1944 rebellion, though crushed, led to the destruction of a crematorium. The Germans launched an investigation and discovered the identities of the smugglers. Heilman's sister and several of her accomplices were hanged. Heilman was the sole survivor of the plot.

Robert Clary was a bright beacon in a dark landscape.

After Germany's occupation of France, he was shipped to a succession of camps. In a unique form of resistance, he provided comfort to his fellow prisoners by singing Yiddish songs. His performances reminded them that they were human beings.

Friedl Dicker Brandeis, a noted designer and art therapist, shared her gifts with the children of Theresienstadt before being sent to Auschwitz along with 46 of her pupils.

Through her secret classes, she released them from the brutality of everyday life in that miserable camp.

Two of her pupils, Ella Wissberger and Helga Kinsky, fondly recall this warm, empathetic person, this woman who served as a surrogate mother to countless distressed children.

These are the extraordinary, heretofore unknown heroes this stirring film highlights in so stellar a fashion.

HISTORICAL NOVEL FOCUSES ON BAR KOKHBA REBELLION

Gefen Publishing House of Jerusalem has recently published My Husband, Bar Kokhba, a new novel from Andrew Sanders, a Budapest-born author who divides his time between Toronto and Haifa.

The book is a second work of historical fiction from Sanders and is a sequel to his earlier novel, Hanina My Son, which Gefen produced in 2001.

As one might suppose, the story focuses on the revolutionary second-century Jewish leader Shimeon Bar Kokhba (Kosiva) and the irreconcilable world views of the Roman empire and the Jewish people. The tale also sheds light on the great talmudic sage Rabbi Akiva, as well as on the Roman Emperor Hadrian.

"Bar Kokhba came closer than anybody else in the world to defeating the Roman army," Sanders said. "He didn't defeat it, but he really shook it and achieved glorious victories for the Jewish state.

"In the end he might have lost, but he saved Jewry. The Romans didn't want the Jewish religion and wanted the Jews to bow down to their idols. They wanted to make the Jewish deity just one more in their pantheon of gods. If it wasn't for Bar Kokhba, the Jews might have accepted Roman rule."

According to Sanders, the book is "absolutely historically correct in every event" and is fully in accord with anything about the period that appears in the Talmud or the works of the Roman historians.

"Nobody can say that there is anything in the book that could not have happened," he said. "You can say of it that it's a true history book, even if it is in the fiction category."

For his latest project, the author has begun a new work of historical fiction, one set in Europe in more recent times. The focus is Bohemia, Slovakia and Hungary of the 18th and 19th centuries.

Kind words about us from a resident's sister ...

Dear Judy:

I just wanted to let you know how elated I feel after attending my brother Sam's Bar Mitzvah.

A year ago, my brother resigned himself to giving up the house. He was tired of the battle of keeping it up, looking after himself, dealing with health problems, and living a lonely existence.

He asked me to help him sell the house and find him a place to live. I couldn't see him moving into an apartment as he would still be lonely and have many of the same concerns, so I took him to look at retirement homes. We looked at some that looked snobby and some that looked dismal, but nothing seemed right until I visited the L'chaim Retirement Home.

It was difficult for Sam to give up some of his independence at first, but you and the staff at L'chaim were wonderful and understanding and helped him to adjust. He made many friends, in particular, Carlos, who is a fine person who seems to have faith in Sam and encouraged him to attend the local shul.

Only four days ago, Sam told me that he was going to have his Bar Mitzvah. Something that must have been on his mind for many, many years.

My son, my sister and I attended Sam's Bar Mitzvah. When we walked into the synagogue, we were surprised to be greeted with great respect and an atmosphere of celebration. Everybody we met expressed such admiration for Sam.

Sam looked great dressed in the new shirt and tie that you gave him. He went throughout the congregation and shook the hands of every person.

After the service, there was a lovely kiddish and that is when we saw the beautiful cake that you sent in Sam's honour. We later went back to L'chaim and it was wonderful to see that Sam was very warmly received and congratulated by everyone.

Judy, I want to thank you for all that you have done to make Sam's life so meaningful. He has come a long way in a year, thanks to you.

I wish you continued success at L'chaim, and all the best.

Sincerely yours, Marlene Lipson

Emily Brady lost 61 pounds.

BEFORE

"After giving birth to my third child, I became content with life. We frequently ate out. I ate when the kids ate and constantly snacked between meals. My complacency in life caused me to gain a staggering amount of weight in a short period of time.

"I melted off 61 pounds and kept it off for three effortless years!"

I had tried to lose weight with an array of weight loss fads and diets. I would deprive myself and pray that it would make a difference. It didn't. I would end up binging on chocolate or snacks. Each time I would gain back my weight faster than I lost it.

Then one day I heard about Positive Changes Hypnosis and my life changed forever. My free evaluation was relaxing and fun. When I considered how much money I had wasted on diets and pills that didn't deliver, I decided that Positive Changes made good sense. I signed up and melted off 61 lbs.! My dress size plunged from a tight 16 to a slender size 6.

"Why go on a diet when losing weight can be this easy?"

Losing weight with hypnosis was easier than I ever dreamed possible… far easier than diets and pills! There were many times I didn't even think about my weight, but I was still losing, and I never felt deprived. I am 100% satisfied with my results.

I don't even think about my weight. Hypnosis has changed my eating habits and there's no way I would go back.

Hypnosis has given me control. I eat less and enjoy it more. I would recommend Positive Changes to anyone who wants to lose weight… and I do recommend the program all the time! Why go on a diet when losing weight can be this easy?"

— Emily Brady

AFTER

When will you make your Positive Change?

"If I am not for myself, who will be for me? ....
And if not now, when?"
— Rabbi Hillel

Alon Blumberger stopped smoking.

My name is Alon Blumberger. I was born in Israel and came to Toronto when I was 13. Who would have ever thought I'd be in The Canadian Jewish News sharing a personal success story? I live in Toronto with my wife, Karen, and our two children, Jordana and Lauren. I own a garage repair facility and a gas station in Richmond Hill.

I heard about Positive Changes from my sister-in-law and she had given me a testimonial of another guy who had quit smoking through hypnosis. Originally, I was a bit skeptical about "hypnosis" — I mean, how could anyone stop smoking effortlessly? So I went for a free consultation. There was no pressure.

"I had smoked for over 23 years ... I've improved myself, my life, reduced stress, and many other benefits"

My goal originally was to just quit smoking. However, I was able to reduce my stress AND quit smoking during my program. Hypnosis worked for me. Hypnosis changed my life. I am now able to relax. I can sit through a session without fidgeting. That is quite an achievement for me because before hypnosis I could never sit still or relax and now I can do this easily, anywhere.

Friends are telling me that there is something different about me. My family is very happy and proud of my achievements. They love the changes. Positive Changes has definitely helped me to improve myself, my life, reduced stress, and many other benefits.

Today, a friend visited me at work and said "Let's go for a cigarette" and I said "I quit, I don't smoke anymore". He laughed and didn't believe me since I had smoked for over 23 years. Then I told him about Positive Changes and how hypnosis worked for me. So he saw me watching him light a cigarette and inhale with no desire for a cigarette. He was impressed.

In the past I tried to quit smoking with the patch, but it worked for only a short period of time. I still felt strong cravings for a cigarette. But now, by quitting with hypnosis, I have no cravings. I know this is a permanent change for me. Quitting smoking gives me a new outlook on everything. I see things in a different light.

I am more aware of things that I can do and things that I can achieve. Positive Changes has given me a positive outlook on life and the future, which makes me a happier person. I believe everyone is striving to become less stressed and happier in their busy lives.

Since I quit smoking I have more energy and I'm playing hockey. I have started playing soccer again too. I find myself doing more physical activity like playing more sports, which I enjoy. Instead of smoking my body is doing something that's more productive.

The single most important benefit of quitting smoking is how much better I feel. I feel healthier and it makes me a happier person.

I absolutely recommend Positive Changes Hypnosis to anyone who wants to quit smoking and reduce stress in their life. Why not try it – tell them that Alon sent you."

TODAY'S TEENAGER NEEDS MORE!

By Linda Shapiro

Todays's teenager spends about seven hours a day sitting in school, plus even more hours riding on the bus, doing homework, talking on the phone...Today's teenager needs more.

STIMULATION & MOTIVATION

They need to stimulate their minds with thought provoking issues, socialize with other Jewish teens and have fun. They need to feel good about their accomplishments and themselves.

COMMUNITY INVOLVEMENT

Every teenager has a place in the Jewish Community and the ability to make a valuable contribution. Every teenager must also realize that he or she has a special role in the unfolding of Jewish history. Regardless of background, every teenager can make a difference.

HEALTHY ROLE MODELS

They need to form relationships with role models, two or three years older than themselves. They need to interact with men and women who are grounded, with a realistic perspective on life. All too often, teenagers become manipulated by Hollywood, television and the internet.

CONNECTION & DIRECTION

They need to get connected to their Jewish roots. They need to discover where theycame from so they know where they're going. Far too many teenagers are disillusioned, even cynical, and know nothing about the unique, awesome tradition that is theirs for the taking.

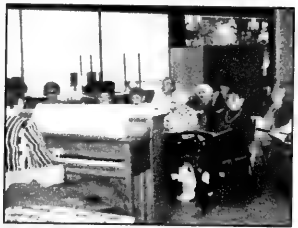
Big changes are underway at the Bernard Betel Centre. 'It's coming along just beautifully.'

New Look, New Life for the Bernard Betel Centre

Growing older can inspire many new adventures. For The Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, growing older has opened the door to the twenty-first century.

For over twenty years, the Betel Centre has offered seniors' classes and programs in its building at Bathurst and Steeles, with no major updates.



Before: No major refurbishments in twenty years.

Speaking to over 700 seniors, we learned they wanted an inviting place to take classes, socialize and volunteer. Our Board of Directors responded with an appealing new design, and renovations are nearly complete.

Our kosher cafeteria will now offer an intimate atmosphere, with a nearby lounge. The newly-renovated Music Room offers cozy, natural lighting.

"It's a lovely change," says member Frances Lusthaus, who has come regularly over the summer despite construction. "It's coming along beautifully."

But the heart of the hubbub has been the construction of a state-of-the-art Computer Learning & Resource Centre. It will feature comfortable chairs and tables, large monitors and other senior-friendly features. Seniors told us existing computer classes aren't geared towards them. We are responding with instruction tailored specifically to beginner and intermediate seniors, at an appropriate pace, with plenty of individual attention.

"The greatest feature is that you're in a class with other seniors," says Jennifer Paquette, Computer Centre co-ordinator. "You can talk with fellow students, see what they're doing. You learn from their curiosity.

"People ask, 'are you sure you can teach someone like me?' Absolutely. Everybody can learn." She's also seeking senior volunteers to help during classes and Open Lab time. Volunteers "don't need to have all the answers," she says, "just know a little more than somebody else."

Computer volunteer Shirley Gladstone says, "in this day and age, it's so important to use computers…I wouldn't do without it."

After: Volunteers enjoy spacious new Ticket Sales Desk area

From October 14 to 17, come explore this exciting new look at our Open House. Enjoy classes, lectures and entertainment, all at no charge! The week will also include our Annual General Meeting breakfast, featuring The Toronto Star's "Ask Ellie" – Ellie Tesher – answering questions submitted in advance about relationships, life and love!

Israeli researchers make medical breakthroughs proved the effectiveness of the antibodies as a pharmaceutical treatment even among patients who have already been infected by the virus.

The results of the study proved the original findings of doctors at Netanya's Laniado Hospital, who succeeded in improving the condition of a female West Nile patient using the antibody treatment.

Since developing the drug, Omrix has a signed co-operation agreement with the National Institute of Health in the United States to carry out clinical tests of the Israeli product.

In other parts of the country, researchers at the Weizmann Institute of Science have discovered a non-hereditary genetic risk factor that influences the tendency of tobacco smokers to develop lung cancer.

New drug to slow spread of West Nile fever

The researchers have found that the chances of smokers with the genetic risk factor for lung cancer to develop the disease are 120 times greater than non-smokers who do not carry the genetic factor.

The genetic material is found when cell nuclei that are struck some 20,000 times a day by various forms of radiation such as solar radiation, come into contact with various materials such as cigarette smoke, and suffer internal damage caused by by-products of the body's metabolism. These are likely to upset the order of the elements that make up the genetic material and to create genetic mutations, which can lead to various diseases, particularly cancer.

To avoid the creation of such undesirable mutations, the cells activate enzyme systems that repair the damage caused to the genetic material. These systems scan the DNA and identify flaws using a sophisticated system of molecular sensors. When the system identifies a flaw, it conducts a kind of local surgery: The repairing enzymes cut and remove the affected areas and replace them with new, repaired DNA.

"The more efficient the repairing enzymes, the less the risk of mutations leading to cancer," says Prof. Zvi Livneh, head of chemical biology at the Weizmann Institute who conducted the research with Dr. Tamar Paz-Elizur. Also participating in the research were Dr. Meir Krupsky from Sheba Medical Center and other researchers.

Tobacco smoke contains several dozen carcinogenic elements that affect genetic composition. Most of the population manages to overcome the influence of those carcinogenic materials through defensive mechanisms like the repair mechanism.

"Statistics show that only 10 percent of heavy smokers develop lung cancer," says Livneh. "We asked ourselves what are the differences between smokers, and reached the conclusion that some are more sensitive or have a genetic predisposition. Our research shows that one of the reasons for the varying degrees of sensitivity is connected to a low level of one of the repairing enzymes."

The researchers focused on repairing enzyme OGG1, 8-oxoguanine DNA glycosylase 1. The enzyme functions to remove from the genetic material damage caused as a a result of oxidized radicals that are also found in tobacco smoke and that cause a large number of mutations. The researchers developed a new blood test, which enables measurement of the extent of OGG1 activity, and found that 40 per cent of those people afflicted with lung cancer are characterized by a low level of that enzyme activity. In the healthy population, on the other hand, only four per cent are characterized by low enzyme activity.

The researchers found that a person with low OGG1 is 5-10 times more likely to develop lung cancer than a person with a normal level of OGG1; and when a smoker has low OGG1, their relative chances of getting lung cancer are 120 times greater than the chances of someone with normal levels of OGG1 activity.

"That's very logical," says Livneh. "A person whose natural repair mechanisms are weak is more exposed to the damage caused to the genetic makeup since the repairing system is not capable of handling the burden. As a result, a large number of mutations form and the risk of lung cancer increases."

Livneh said that although only a minority of smokers have low levels of OGG1 activity, that is still many – some 160,000 such people fall ill every year in the United States alone. He said the research had several ramifications.

"Anti-smoking campaigns are not very effective in most cases because it is a general warning and people say, 'It won't happen to me.' Now, if a person has a test and discovers they are in a high risk group, they will regard it as a personal message and it might give them motivation to quit smoking."

Livneh added that his team was now working on the development of a simpler, cheap way for health organizations worldwide to offer blood tests that would provide information about the risk level of someone being examined.

Apprentice jockey bucks controversy over career choice

By HARLAN C. ABBEY
Special to The CJN

FORT ERIE, Ont. — Most sports include some type of danger, but only in horse racing does an ambulance follow participants around the field of play.

Maybe Willie Nelson's song Mamas, Don't Let Your Babies Grow Up To Be Cowboys should have been called Mamas, Don't Let Your Babies Grow Up To Be Jockeys. Especially female jockeys.

Jillian Scharfstein, an apprentice jockey who rides at Woodbine Racetrack Wednesday through Sunday and at Fort Erie on Monday and Tuesday, admits she encountered resistance when she decided to compete in the most dangerous sport of all.

Scharfstein, the first Jewish woman jockey since Barbara Jo Rubin in the 1960s – and possibly the only Jewish jockey of either sex currently in thoroughbred racing – admits there was "a fair bit of controversy" when she decided to become a rider.

"All my family are doctors or lawyers," she said. "My family can't even spell horse."

Scharfstein's father James is an attorney in her hometown of Saskatoon.

When Scharfstein was less than one year old, her mother, Janalynn, a nurse, took her to a friend's farm and held her on a horse's back. "They tell me I cried and carried on when she took me off," Scharfstein said.

"Then I had a toy bouncy horse, which moved when you bounced on it. I rode the paint off mine."

A pre-bat mitzvah present included riding lessons, which were designed as a reward for more time in preparation. Then came summer riding camp and more lessons after her bat mitzvah.

"I was rated first in jumping and third in dressage in my pony club for all of the area," Scharfstein recalled.

But competing in shows and riding lessons became very expensive. "I stopped riding for a year but I was not happy and almost dropped out of school, although my grades always were good."

Jillian Scharfstein on board Storm Ruckus

When she was 15, a breeder she met at a tack shop (which sells riding equipment and clothing) told her about a two-year-old filly he had that he couldn't break.

"I'll break her," Scharfstein promised.

Admiring her spirit, he soon offered her a job galloping his other horses at his farm and at the Marquis Downs 5/8-mile track. Finally she was being paid to ride, instead of paying to ride.

A year later, she received her racetrack licence. At 17, the opportunity arose to move to Edmonton to gallop horses at Northlands Park, where she was paid $7 per horse instead of the $5 she was paid at Marquis Downs: "You could get on 20 horses a day if you broke the babies on the farms after the racetrack closed down for track maintenance.

"Last year, I started my jockey career at Evergreen Park, an unrecognized track in Grand Prairie, Alta. I won my first race on [the horse] Another Rio, despite my eyes popping out of my head with excitement. In the next race, an overnight stakes for fillies and mares, I won on a longshot, Jar of Buttons.

"I went on to be the second-leading thoroughbred rider. Jar of Buttons and I won another stake and then took a third. She was named champion mare of the five-week meet. Her trainer gave me the trophy, and I have it at home between her two winner's circle pictures."

Scharfstein, who is 5-1 and weighs 108 pounds (including her saddle, helmet and protective vest), returned to Northlands Park and won three races. Her longshot wins paid an average of $48.

Last winter, a friend got her a job at the top-class Adena Springs Farm in Florida. There, she exercised six horses a day, including a half-sister to the top stakes winners Macho Uno and Awesome Again. After riding, she spent her time "hanging out at the pools and beaches and watching what I eat. If it was up to me, I'd eat a chocolate cake and a pint of ice cream every night."

As an apprentice rider, Scharfstein's mounts received 10 pounds off their assigned weight in a race. After her first five wins, the allowance dropped to five pounds and after 50 wins she will become a "journeyman" rider, with no break in the weights.

By early August, Scharfstein had a total of 14 wins, including two in one day at Fort Erie. On Aug. 4, she finished back of the pack on Storm Ruckus in the fourth race, then finished second in a $60,000 stake race, the sixth, on the longest shot in the four horse field. She won the last race on tough-to-handle Red Dragon.

She averages two to five mounts per day at fees ranging from $59 to $100 (in stakes races). If she wins, she gets 10 per cent of her horse's 60 per cent of the total purse.

On paper, it looks like a lot, but "taxes, Jockeys' Guild dues, and your valet's pay take about 30 per cent of the total, and you pay your agent 25 per cent of your net."

Despite the colorful silks, beautiful horses, crowds of racing fans and the salary, a jockey's life is far from glamorous. Scharfstein rises between 4:30 and 5:00 a.m. each day and is at the track ready to ride one to 10 horses during morning training.

"You don't get paid to exercise horses. You do it to ride them in races," she said.

"I never eat before I ride, so I may have fruit juice when I get up. We have to be in the jockeys' room by 11 a.m. and there I may eat fruit or a power bar, try to get some sleep, read the Racing Form, and watch replays of the races on TV.

"When I get home, I take my dog and put on my roller blades and go to a nearby park. Dinner is usually an organic frozen dinner. I'm in bed by 8 or 9 p.m."

Despite the fact every rider is trying to ride the best horse in every race, there is a sense of comradeship among those competing in this dangerous sport, which often puts one or more riders in wheelchairs permanently each year.

"In a recent race, I lost a stirrup coming out of the gate, which threw my balance off and limited my control of my horse. The rider alongside me kept my horse from running out around the turn. No other jockey is going to try to hurt you," she said.

Trainer Daryl Ezra, who also is Jewish, said Scharfstein "is relatively polished for an apprentice. She has good posture and good hands and she doesn't panic.

"She puts a horse where he belongs. And she has a lot of insight in analyzing his performance after the race."

"You know apprentices are going to make mistakes," veteran trainer Nick Gonzalez added. "But the more they ride the better they get. If you see progress, it's worth it to use them. If I lose a race by a nose, I second-guess myself for not using an apprentice and getting that five pounds off."

On the day she was interviewed, Scharfstein lost a photo finish in the first race, had a long break to play with her Jack Russell terrier, Misfit, and then ate dust in the ninth race.

"I'll come every Monday and Tuesday," she said, "even if my mounts are 20-to-one. I could ride five days at Woodbine and two here for the rest of my life."

Remembering what is important

20 something

By JODI KOVITZ

A rabbi that I respect tremendously recently said to me, "So Jodi, are you preparing for the High Holy Days?" I answered him, "Rabbi, how can I get ready for the High Holy Days when I barely have time to sleep? I have 67 new e-mails to respond to, 28 phone calls to make, two articles to write, 170 pages to read in my law textbooks, a community event to plan and put on, a family to see, friends to catch up with, a relationship to enjoy, and work to finish for a boss that I had over the summer. And the worst part, rabbi, is that it always seems that my family time, friend time, and time for myself suffer because I am so busy with my professional life!"

The rabbi smiled and said to me, "Jodi, even though it's easy to get caught up in the daily grind, remember what's important to you."

Through chatting with many of my Jewish peers, I have learned that my ongoing struggle to achieve both personal and professional success is actually quite common. My "e-mail filled, voice-mail filled, try-to-get-to-the-gym, get-all-my-work-done, grow intellectually, grow psychologically, all while trying to check other errands off the to-do list days" are actually typical of my 20-something friends.

Over the past couple of years of studying Jewish ritual, I have come to understand the great gift of keeping Shabbat. Although I am not at a place in my own journey into Judaism that I have committed to practising the mitzvah, I certainly appreciate the great sense of peace, calm and opportunity for reflection that it can bring to people's lives.

For me, the High Holy Days provide a similar opportunity for renewal (although it is certainly one that demands a lower level of commitment).

For some, the High Holy Days are an opportunity to spend time in synagogue reflecting on what's important to them. We are given time to ask for forgiveness from God and are encouraged to ask forgiveness from our friends and families. For others, these holidays are simply days that give us permission to stop our "busyness." By ignoring our to-do lists, turning off our computers and changing our auto-pilot ways, we can take time to renew our priorities.

As we approach the New Year, I am reminded of all the 20-somethings that lost their lives or their loved ones on Sept. 11th 2001. I think of the 20-somethings going about their daily lives in Israel under constant threat of senseless terrorist attacks. I think of our predecessors who died fighting for Israel's independence. I also think of our 20-something ancestors who did not survive the Holocaust. I reflect upon all of their lost opportunities to live out their dreams and spend time with their friends and families.

The reflections of the New Year jolt us into regaining a more balanced perspective. Do they make us wish we could spend more time at the office? I don't think so.

While I, like many other young adults of my generation, feel tremendous pressure to succeed, achieve and "do," I am grateful for the yearly opportunity that the High Holy Days afford me to refocus, reflect and renew my real commitments and basic values.

I wish you all a healthy, balanced, hopeful and reflective New Year. Thank you for your readership and support.

I continue to welcome your feedback at jlkovitz@hotmail.com.

Epi on Education

Losing the analogy

Recently, the people responsible for administering the scholastic assessment test (SAT) that helps to determine acceptance to American universities made a historic decision to remove the analogies section of the test. These are the questions that go like this: apples are to oranges as roses are to tulips – true or false. It was felt that analogies do not test easily and that contemporary students are not sufficiently trained to answer this type of question (or are being trained specifically to pass this section of the SAT).

Responses to this development range from shock at the sad level of student thinking to the demand that analogies no longer be taught. In fact, this change in the SAT points to two issues that are intimately related: the questionable value of standardized tests and the inestimable worth of analogy in thinking.

The study of the Talmud and its commentaries requires the use of analogy and metaphor, using time-honoured techniques to decipher meaning from the text. Indeed, even the techniques have become texts in themselves.

But the use of analogy is not well-suited to time-limited mass testing. The study technique involves close reading, peer deliberation (chevrutah), and hours of contemplation – not something that one does alone, rushed, and nervous!

Removing the analogy section from the SAT is not a justification for not teaching analogy/metaphor, which would result in a great loss of creative thought. It is simply an admission that SAT-like tests are very limited in their ability to fairly assess either universal merit or non-linear ability, and it is a recognition that analogical thinking is a slow and deliberative process best practised outside of the examination hall.

It is precisely this lack of fit that illustrates the weakness of the one and the great value of the other.

The Best Medicine

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

Message from Joseph Mapa, President and CEO

It has been an amazing year full of challenges including SARS and the recent power outage. Your understanding and support have been uplifting for our staff. Through our world-class staff, we have overcome these challenges and pursued a number of opportunities to expand our services to the community to provide you with The Best Medicine.

After months of discussions, Lawrence S. Bloomberg, Chair of the Board and I were delighted to receive $3 million from the Ontario Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care to increase the capacity of our cancer surgical program in order to address waiting lists that were unfortunately made longer because of the SARS situation. Additional significant funding was also received to increase our surgical program in our Department of Dentistry. This funding will enable us to offer enhanced services to our patients and a post-graduate training program in complex oral surgery. Mount Sinai Hospital's Department of Dentistry has a national and international reputation for excellence. The incorporation of the University of Toronto's Faculty of Dentistry Oral and Maxillofacial Surgery Program into our Hospital's Department of Dentistry will bring complementary expertise to our organization. It also makes our dental program one of the largest, most comprehensive hospital-based academic dental programs in North America.

The expanded services attest to the talent of our staff and the unique role this hospital plays in the province. Your continued support is also indispensable.

Another "par" for the Course Event

There were long drives and short drives, some hooks and slices, and then there was thunder and rain. Most importantly, there were laughs and good cheer at the seventh annual Henry's Tournament fore Health on Monday, August 11 at the Board of Trade Country Club.

Over 300 women came out for the golf tournament and dinner in support of the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, playing on both courses at the Club. Beverly Thomson, News Anchor with Global Television welcomed the women with an inspirational message as she recounted her own experience with breast cancer. Towards the end of the day, the heavens opened up, but it did not dampen the spirits of the ladies who enjoyed supporting this important cause.

A special thank you to Henry's Camera, who was not only the Title Sponsor, but also provided outstanding volunteers and assistance throughout the day. Thanks to our Presenting Sponsor, Scotiabank as well as our other major sponsors Audi, Canon, The Yachts of Seabourn, and Air Canada who ensured the success of the day.

Taking some practice shots before the start of the tournament.

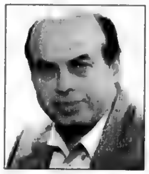
Arafat must be ousted: Sharansky



Natan Sharansky

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Yasser Arafat must be ousted from office as president of the Palestinian Authority because he is an impediment to peace, Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky said in an interview Sunday before going on a week-long tour of Canadian and American university campuses.

"He has been a very negative influence, and that's why he has to be removed," said Sharansky, a minister without portfolio responsible for Diaspora affairs and Jerusalem.

He made this comment after Israel last week officially announced its intention to "remove" Arafat, who is also chair of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Sharansky, a former Refusenik and human rights advocate who spent nine years in Soviet gulags and prisons in the 1970s and 1980s before his release, said Arafat's influence was behind the latest series of Hamas suicide bombings in Israel that have claimed the lives of almost 40 Israelis.

'Judges meet supreme test in war on terror'

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Israel must never forsake the rule of law and protection of democratic values and human rights, even if that means prolonging the war on terror, says the country's chief justice.

"The struggle against terror is conducted inside the law, not outside it. This is how we distinguish ourselves from the terrorists," Aharon Barak, president of Israel's Supreme Court, said here last week.

"The line between war and peace is thin," he said. "If we fail in war and terror, we will fail in peace and tranquility."

Barak was giving an address, sponsored by the nearly completed Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto and the Massuah Institute for the Study of the Holocaust, the day after twin suicide bombings killed at least 15 people in Jerusalem and Rishon LeZion.

He said Israel must stick to its democratic core even in its battle against terrorism.

"Israel must protect itself from terror but at the same time, must protect democracy and human rights," Barak said. "Only a state built on the foundations of human dignity will endure."

The News in Brief

CANADA

New Fire Relief Fund

VANCOUVER — The Okanagan Jewish Community Centre in Kelowna, B.C., has created the Barmor Fire Relief Fund to assist an Israeli family who lost their home in ongoing fires in B.C.'s Okanagan Valley. Ofer and Ofri Barmor and their two daughters, 10 and 8, moved to Kelowna a few months ago to start a goat farm. By the time their farm buildings were nearly built, the fire had started and they couldn't get insurance. Fire destroyed the buildings and they incurred severe damage to their house, estimated in total at $200,000.

Israelis Drown Off Nfld.

HALIFAX — Days after pounding Bermuda, Hurricane Fabian killed three Israeli men in the Atlantic Ocean after their 23-metre motorized yacht capsized in rough seas off the coast of Newfoundland last week. The Canadian Coast Guard retrieved the bodies of the men, who were wearing immersion suits, about 600 kilometres east of Cape Race, Nfld., Tuesday afternoon. A signal from an emergency radio beacon alerted U.S. rescue officials to the men's plight last Sunday evening, around the time the eye of the hurricane passed over their location. One of the men had purchased the yacht in the United States and planned to sail it back to Israel with one of the other men, an experienced ship's captain. The three sailed out of Boston, passed through Halifax and were to begin heading to Israel via Europe.

ISRAEL

Budget Cuts Proposed

JERUSALEM — Israeli Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has presented a draft of Israel's 2004 budget. It details $2.25 billion (US) in spending cuts, including about $600 million from defence. Reports said the deficit target will be four per cent, up from three per cent last year.

WORLD

Sharon Visits India

MUMBAI — Indian police last week arrested more than 100 Muslims who were protesting Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's visit there. The arrests, which came in Mumbai during one of many rallies against the visit, fuelled fears of a possible terror attack. Sharon was welcomed earlier at the presidential palace in New Delhi. Meanwhile, India's prime minister said Israeli-Indian ties will be strengthened in the coming years. Sharon's trip, the first by an Israeli prime minister since the two countries established full ties 11 years ago, was cut short as he returned home to deal with terror attacks. The visit focused on defence and technological co-operation.

Barbie a Jew?

RIYADH — Barbie dolls are Jewish tools, the Saudi government says. The blond dolls promote the lewd behaviour of a "perverted western world," say posters distributed by the Saudi religious police in Saudi schools, mosques and hospitals. The poster, called The Jewish Doll, is sponsored by the Commission for the Promotion of Virtue and Prevention of Vice, a state agency headed by a Wahabbi cleric appointed by King Fahd.

Riefenstahl Dies

BERLIN — Leni Riefenstahl, known for her documentary film about a 1934 Nazi rally at Nuremberg, died last week at age 101 in Bavaria. Critics said Riefenstahl helped promote a Nazi esthetic of beauty and purity in Triumph of the Will and her other films from the Hitler era. But she said her films were a search for beauty. Boycotted after the war, she made a comeback in the 1960s with films of Africa's Nuba people and underwater life.

French Compensation

PARIS — France will compensate thousands of people whose parents were victims of "Nazi barbarity" in World War II, including those killed in massacres or for resisting the German occupation, the government said Sept. 6. Some 5,000 to 8,000 people would be eligible, and can choose from either a $30,400 (US) lump sum or monthly payments. The money matches funds awarded three years ago to 12,600 Jewish orphans whose parents were deported to death camps during the Nazi occupation.

Diaspora Museum May Close Permanently

TEL AVIV — The 63 staffers at Beth Hatefutsoth, the Nahum Goldmann Museum of the Jewish Diaspora, were given an unpaid three-month vacation last week as the famed museum's doors were temporarily closed due to ongoing financial problems.

The decision to send the workers home was made at the institution's latest board of directors meeting. But museum director Ranny Finzi said "it is unlikely the workers will find the institute open when they come back from vacation."

Beth Hatefutsoth, which features models and Judaica items from Jewish communities around the world, owes some $2.25 million (US) to suppliers, largely because of a sharp decline in revenues as tourism has dried up since the start of the second intifadah three years ago.

Meanwhile, in 2003, ongoing funding from the Ministry of Education, Tel Aviv city hall and Tel Aviv University, where the museum is based, was about $1.5 million, half what it was the year before. Jewish Agency funding remains stable.

Last month, Education Minister Limor Livnat named a committee to find a way to solve the crisis. An interim report said the museum needs structural reforms, including new revolving exhibitions, before it can re-open. Meanwhile, some 30 MKs have signed a proposed bill that would recognize the institute as a national museum, like Yad Vashem, with the state responsible for its budget.

Liberal MPs, senators oppose Al-Jazeera license

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A group of Liberal MPs and senators is opposing the application by cable providers to bring the controversial Qatar-based network Al-Jazeera to Canadian digital cable subscribers.

Inclusion of the Arab-language network would likely lead to incitement against Jews, breaches of Canada's anti-hate laws and damage to the country's multicultural mosaic, the lawmakers argue.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada have already lined up in opposition to the license application, citing Al-Jazeera's track record of broadcasting anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial and glorifying suicide bombers

The Canadian Arab Federation (CAF) and the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations, meanwhile, have stated they would support the application. In a news release, the CAF states it is important for Arabs and Muslims to hear news from the Middle East "without North American filters."

'Would be detrimental to the public good'

The controversy stems from a request by the Canadian Cable Television Association, an industry lobby group, and Vidéotron Ltée to add Al-Jazeera to the list of digital channels that can be distributed in Canada.

The Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC), which regulates the broadcasting industry, has solicited the input of Canadians on proposals to add a variety of non-Canadian satellite services for digital distribution, among them Al-Jazeera.

In a written submission to the CRTC, the 13 Liberal parliamentarians say that "allowing the Al-Jazeera channel to be carried in Canada would be detrimental to the public good. We believe this will disrupt the tolerant, multicultural makeup of Canadian society, import extremist hatred into Canadian living rooms and result in an increase of crimes directed against the Jewish people within Canada. As such, we are asking the CRTC to deny the application."

The submission is signed by senators Jack Austin, Isobel Finnerty, Leo Kolber, Richard Kroft and MPs Carolyn Bennett, Irwin Cotler, Art Eggleton, Raymonde Folco, Marlene Jennings, Anita Neville, Jim Peterson, Jacques Saada and Joe Volpe. Most of the MPs represent ridings with substantial Jewish populations. Earlier this summer, the same group called on the Liberal government to shift federal policy on the Middle East toward a more pro-Israel stance.

The group's nine-page submission to the CRTC cites instances when Al-Jazeera provided a platform for terrorist organizations such as Al Qaeda and Hezbollah to disseminate their views. The network has also aired its own programs that have engaged in Holocaust denial and encouraged terrorist suicide attacks, they say.

Among the incidents cited in the submission:

- an interview with KKK leader David Duke;
- an interview with French Holocaust-denier Robert Faurisson, who testified for Nazi apologist Ernst Zundel at two of his Canadian trials;
- a statement by a Saudi cleric saying "Jews are the most despicable people… worms… all evil."
- an interview with a mufti who said "there can be no peace with the Jews because they suck and use the blood of Arabs on the holiday [sic] of Passover and Purim."
- a statement by Sheikh Yousif Al-Karadawi of Al-Jazeera's own Sharia and Life program that "every man has the right to blow himself up inside this [Israeli] military society."

Conscience and voting

From the editor's desk

The independence of this newspaper is one of its chief hallmarks. That the editorial views of the paper are generally at or near the centre of the range of debate on the issues of the day and supportive of the work of key community institutions is a reflection of the mandate from the board of directors and of the editor's personal proclivities. It is not a reflection of mouthpiece journalism, the accusation occasionally hurled at The CJN. This paper is not owned by, nor does it owe anything to, any individual or organization. That is one of its great strengths.

The CJN also does not support a specific politician or political party. It does not editorially advocate on behalf of any politician or political party. That is a steadfast policy.

There was, however, one exception to that policy: The CJN wholeheartedly supported the federalist cause during the Quebec referenda. By definition, of course, that meant actively opposing the separatist policies of the Parti Quebecois.

But as a rule, the paper comments on and criticizes policies, not politicians. The merits of a party's policies should be the deciding factor in determining political support, not the subjective – and by definition, ephemeral – merits of an individual. Sometimes, of course, the two are intertwined. This is especially the case when decision-making is concentrated in very few hands, a phenomenon which, of late, has increasingly characterized all levels of government.

Thus, one of the most important tasks for the voter is to try to differentiate between the image and the essence of the candidate. This is particularly difficult to do in an era dominated by television.

As with most other aspects of our lives, television has forever altered the political system. Criteria for successful political leadership, alas, have more to do with being "telegenic," with mastering a 30-second sound byte, with simply looking good, rather than with simply being good, or with one's character, competence, judgment and skill.

The leaders' debates in an election are theatre. The paid political messages are product-marketing infomercials. We know they are the distortions of the studio world.

That is our democratic system in the 21st century.

But it is better than any other.

In two weeks, Ontario voters will choose a new government. And while it may sound too much the Pollyanna cliché in a cynical age such as ours, it warrants reminding readers that there is no more important civic act in a democracy than voting.

It is The CJN's fervent hope that its readers will turn out in great numbers to cast their ballots and that they do so according to conscience and thoughtful consideration.

In keeping with CJN policy, the paper will not suggest for whom readers should vote. But it will suggest the issues readers might keep uppermost in mind when they place their marks on the ballot.

As CJN reporter Ron Csillag reported in last week's issue, the Equity in Education Tax Credit has emerged as the "hot-button issue" for a large segment of the province's Jewish community. He quotes Simon Rosenblum of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, who confirmed it to be a "make-it-or-break-it" issue for the community.

The tax credit was enacted by the Conservative government after a long, but highly focused lobbying campaign and consultations with a broad, multi-faith coalition of citizens.

The campaign was a last resort after all the legal challenges to the propriety of the provincial government's unfair education funding policy had failed.

Its result was the tax credit.

The credit, to be implemented incrementally over five years, is not a perfect solution to the problem of the onerous financial burden upon families whose children attend private schools. As even a partial solution to the problem of ensuring affordability of private day school eduction, its structure is flawed.

It does nothing for the schools to reduce their costs of providing education. Instead, it confers some tax-based assistance, after the tuition has been paid, upon the parents. It provides a measure of relief to those parents who send their children to private religious schools, even as they also pay their full share of taxes into the treasury to sustain the public education system.

Thus, achieving some element of fundamental fairness for non-Catholic families who pay a crushing double burden to have a religious component in their children's education is indeed a pre-eminent issue in the upcoming election.

If, after the votes have been cast, the present legislation is repealed, it will still be morally incumbent upon a newly elected government to find a way of achieving that fairness. The issue will not go away, even if this specific "remedy," the Equity in Education Tax Credit, does.

Of course, the tax credit is not the only important issue in the election. There are many important issues: the quality of health care, social assistance levels, uniform accessibility to health and educational services for all children with special needs, the quality of the environment and the decaying infrastructure in our cities, to name but a few.

Before we vote, most voters will ask themselves: which party do I believe will provide the best government? It is in response to this question alone that we should all be casting our votes. —MBD

Community rally responds to Jews for Jesus

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

"No matter how kosher the bacon looks, it's still bacon," Gavriel Aryeh Sanders told listeners at a "Stand Up for Judaism" rally on Sept. 7.

As an Orthodox Jew and former evangelical Christian missionary, Sanders knows the difference between what's "kosher" and what's not.

The rally, held in the social hall of the Toronto Zionist Centre, was a community-wide response to an intensive missionary campaign by Jews for Jesus. Called "Behold Your God" after a verse in Isaiah, the three-week campaign in Toronto is part of a five-year attempt to evangelize in every city outside Israel with more than 25,000 Jews.

The rally proved Toronto won't take it sitting down. In his opening address, Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, said we have already triumphed where other communities couldn't.

Two weeks ago, Jews for Jesus posted a billboard in the heavily Jewish Bathurst-Wilson area that targeted elderly Jews with the message, "Before you dismiss me, hear my story," offering them a video of Holocaust survivors touting Christianity.

"This Jewish community won't tolerate this," said Farber.

Community leaders swung into action, contacting Viacom Communications, who removed the billboard within hours. Similar attempts in other cities have failed, Farber said, but "Toronto is a special Jewish community."

He praised Viacom for understanding the "utter offensiveness" of the billboard.

Jews for Judaism director Julius Ciss wove insights from his own journey to Judaism into his introductions of the rally's speakers, which included Farber, Sanders, Rabbi Bentzion Kravitz, founder of Jews for Judaism International, and the education director of Jews for Judaism Toronto, Rabbi Michael Skobac.

With little Jewish knowledge, Ciss said he became drawn into Jews for Jesus, but through Farber and others, has since spent many years teaching other Jews about their heritage.

Rabbi Kravitz of Los Angeles, who has also worked to influence Jews to leave Christianity, said the event was "not an anti-Christian rally… it's a pro-Judaism rally."

Much of his work depends on dialogue with other faiths, he said. "I'm not here to denounce Christianity."

Indeed, Rabbi Kravitz said, many mainstream Christians recognize that missionary tactics offend not only Jews but also serious Christians. He said Hebrew-Christian groups "deceive themselves and our children," cloaking what he calls "100 per cent evangelical Christian theology" in familiar Jewish symbols.

"They say Jesus was the Jewish messiah," he said. "That's not the point. The point is they believe he was God."

While asserting superiority to "rabbinic Judaism," Hebrew-Christian missionaries freely poach rabbinic symbols such as kippot and Shabbat candles to claim Jewish legitimacy.

In his talk, Sanders described the evangelical movement from the point of view of a Bible college graduate who spent years seeking converts on kibbutzim. But 10 years ago, he said, his Christianity ran aground.

Of the 300 texts commonly used to "prove" that Jesus fulfils Jewish prophecy, Sanders quoted Rabbi Skobac: "What's 300 times zero? It's still zero."

Sanders described, in crisp, clear Hebrew, how – with Jews for Judaism's help – he concluded that what he'd learned really did add up to zero.

Sanders said he used to insist "the most Jewish thing people can do is believe in Jesus," but added he was drawn to genuine Judaism, partly by the miracle of our continuity.

He said he fell in love with mitzvot – not as "Thou shalt" or "Thou shalt not," but as a "dynamic, living connection to God."

It's not enough to simply oppose Christianity, listeners were told by all five speakers. In his closing remarks, Rabbi Skobac challenged Jews to "fall in love with Judaism," making their homes, schools, synagogues and communities "radiate joy, love and warmth."

Sanders emphasized what he called "the most important institution in Jewish life – the Jewish home."

"There are two types of Jews," Sanders said. "Those whose grandchildren will be Jewish, and those whose grandchildren won't."

The difference, he said, depends on our choices.

MPP Monte Kwinter, attending in a personal capacity, pointed out in an interview after the event the vulnerability of Toronto's Russian Jews to missionaries.

Ciss said other at-risk groups include "fringe" Jews, who are disenfranchised and lonely. He pointed out a popular perception that the missionary threat isn't serious, but then called for a show of hands that revealed that 10 per cent of the rally's attendees knew of Jews who believe in Jesus.

These people need our help, Ciss said, adding that Jews' concern and Jewish commitment has made the biggest difference in his life.

"I was touched by people who cared," he said.

Noy finishes his term as trade commissioner

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Benjamin Noy is ready to go back to Jerusalem.

The bespectacled, grey-haired man who is best known for implementing the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (CIFTA) and enshrining the economic relationship between the two countries retired recently after his second stint as Israel's trade commissioner to Canada.

At his farewell party, hosted by local law firm Goodman and Carr, Noy gave out photocopies of his address and phone number in Jerusalem. He thanked Toronto for hosting him again – the first stint as trade commissioner was from 1989 to 1995 – but said that while he'll miss Toronto and his Canadian friends, he's looking forward to finally going home.

[Stephen Epstein / Big Dipper Communications]

"Jerusalem is home. There's no place like home and I look forward to going back," he said. He will return to a job at the Israeli Ministry of Industry and Trade.

One of the highlights of Noy's posting was arranging a deal for the Israeli and Canadian space agencies to work together on a satellite project. But signing the free trade agreement in 1996, he said, was his shining moment as a diplomat.

"The Canadian government was not sure [the free trade agreement] was worth the effort. Israel was a small country in the Middle East, they weren't sure if it was worthwhile," said Noy.

Although CIFTA took more than three years to put together, trade between the two countries has more than doubled since the agreement was signed and now amounts to more than $600 million, said Noy.

According to the department of foreign affairs and international trade, from 1996 to 2001 Canada's exports to Israel increased by more than 45 per cent, while during the same period its imports increased by more than 130 per cent.

"I think it was a great opportunity for both Canada and Israel. The time that passed actually proved it," said Noy. "It made it easier for Canadians to do business with Israel and Israel to do business with Canada."

Taking over the position as Israeli trade commissioner is Ephraim Shoham.

Shoham, who spent four years in New York for the Israeli Ministry of Industry and Trade, said he is "absolutely excited" with the new posting.

"I have a lot of energy," he said. "I want to identify specialty areas in which Israeli industries can complement Canada's needs… I want to help Israeli industry find partners or customers in Canada."

The Israeli Economic Mission also hosted a trade awards ceremony for Canadian companies that do trade with Israel. Ten companies were honoured with certificates signed by Israel's deputy prime minister.

Ministerial disgrace

That Israel regards Canada as a friend is undeniable. But one often wonders if that friendship exists despite, not because of, the leadership and the policies of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Events of last week were poignantly illustrative.

The statement released last week by Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham following the double suicide bombing attack in Jerusalem was so trite, so hollow, so lacking any substantive and moral weight, that it shocked the conscience. Why, the question begs to be asked, does this government equivocate on matters of clear-cut moral outrage? Why does it steadfastly refuse to point an accusing finger at the planners and the perpetrators of terrorism? Why does it, with such disappointing regularity, seem to miss the point?

"Canada extends its deepest sympathy," the press release begins, "and most sincere condolences to the families who have lost loved ones as a result of the recent violence in the Middle East. We are profoundly saddened by the loss of so many innocent lives.

"We continue to call upon all parties to engage in constructive dialogue, in an effort to put an end to this horrible bloodshed and loss of life. These tragic events emphasize the urgency for both sides to put the peace process back on track."

The minister differentiated not at all between the lives killed by Hamas in cold blood and those that were taken, unintentionally, by the IDF, in self-defence. In failing to distinguish between the two, he made them equivalent. That was simply disgraceful.

The Canada-Israel Committee condemned the government for its moral myopia. And rightly so. "We are appalled by the moral equivalency that characterizes" Graham's statement, Joseph Wilder, national chair of the Canada-Israel-Committee said. "It is unconscionable that he fails to explicitly acknowledge that 15 Israelis had just been murdered and scores of others wounded in gruesome suicide terrorist attacks. The implied comparison between these tragedies, on the one hand, and legitimate Israeli military operations against Hamas terrorists, on the other hand, reflects remarkable insensitivity on Canada's part."

Yet, insensitivity to Israel has been the least offensive characteristic of Canada's Middle East policies. Ethical emptiness and moral timidity have been their key hallmarks.

In a further demonstration, to be sure, of bilateral friendship the minister met later in the week in Ottawa with Israeli Minister of Immigrant Absorption Tzipi Livni. They even issued a joint statement. "Such acts [of terrorism], which are designed to destroy the prospects for peace, result in the death of innocent civilians and can never be justified under any circumstances."

The diplomatic courtesy that restrained Minister Livni, however, does not restrain us.

If moral equivalence is the response of our government in the circumstances we witnessed last week, we are justified in asking: What does Canada stand for? What are our values?

Tories can't buy votes

I think Ron Csillag has greatly underestimated the integrity of voters and their ability to appreciate the many issues in this provincial election campaign ("Education tax credit key issue in Ont. election," CJN, Sept. 11). The Tories think they can buy votes: a tax credit for you, a paved road for you, lumber rights in protected areas for you – and on and on. Surely, voters in this case – Jews who send their children to private schools – can think about more than their own pocketbooks when casting their votes. For the sake of our futures, I hope so.

Will not support Harris/Eves

Jerrold Landau's plea to support the Equity in Education Tax Credit is one with which I fully agree (Letters to the Editor, CJN, Sept. 11). My heart goes out in sincere compassion to the many families and schools in my own community that are desperately struggling to give their students a decent Jewish education and to pay their teachers an adequate wage. However, I disagree with Landau in his urging of the Jewish community to vote for the Progressive Conservative party in the upcoming provincial election.

I will support the tax credit or, if necessary, a creative alternative. But instead of supporting the Harris-Eves government, I will work to defeat it. That is my obligation as a Jew with the sacred mission of being "a light unto the nations."

Remember social justice

Whatever happened to the traditional Jewish concerns of caring and social justice? The Harris/Eves government has been the most mean-spirited, regressive and uncaring government in Ontario for the past 100 years. If Jews in this province do not care about their fellow citizens and the poor way they are being treated by this government, they should recall that anti-Semitism increases when the standard of living declines for significant proportions of the population – something that has happened far too much with the Harris/Eves government.

Recommends Stern's book

I write in praise of Bill Stern's collection of commentaries on Jewish movies, You Don't Have To Be Jewish. Though a small volume, it includes not only thoughtful commentaries on documentaries and popular movies, but also important historical facts such as the role of Jewish Canadian servicemen in World War II and the creation of the State of Israel. The book also lists movies that Stern does not comment on that might be of interest to readers.

To old-timers, the titles in You Don't Have To Be Jewish will bring a sense of nostalgia, and to the young audience who may never have seen the movies included in the book, it may encourage them to either read the books upon which the movies are based, or to see the movies themselves.

I wish to express the sincere gratitude and appreciation of the directors and staff of the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library to Bill Gladstone and The CJN for the story that appeared in your issue of Aug. 21 about our forthcoming Treasures in Jewish Literature series ("Rabbi Witty 'flabbergasted' by large response to lecture series," CJN, Aug. 21).

Regrettably, an error crept into the report.

The opening book review lecture will be presented on Oct. 28, not by Prof. Alan Ackerman as stated in your article, but by Prof. Elaine Newton. She will be reviewing Michael Chabon's Pulitzer Prize-winning novel The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier and Clay.

Ackerman's session is scheduled for Nov. 25 and will be based on Tony Kushner's adaptation of A Dybbuk and Other Tales of the Supernatural.

Mulroney deservedly honoured

Reuven Carin is critical of the creation of a chair at Tel Aviv University named after former prime minister Brian Mulroney (Letters to the Editor, CJN, Sept. 4).

I would argue that Mulroney is an outstanding choice for this honour, having repeatedly demonstrated his deep friendship toward Canadian Jews and the State of Israel. Mulroney's strong support is in sharp contrast to the policies and statements of the present Liberal government, under which Canada has consistently supported the anti-Israel bias adopted by the United Nations and western European countries, especially regarding Palestinian terrorism. With a federal election looming, the Jewish community must be more vocal and demand that our government be more supportive of Israel and its war on terrorism.

Jerusalem family receives double blow: Almost too tragic to be true

By SHOSHANA KORDOVA
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Dr. David Appelbaum, who, since immigrating from Cleveland in 1981 saved thousands of lives as an emergency medicine specialist, was killed at Café Hillel last Tuesday with his daughter, on the eve of her wedding.

Chanan Sand visited his new apartment in the Rehavia neighbourhood of Jerusalem at least four times last week to make sure everything was just right for the day he would move in with the woman he was planning to marry Wednesday night.

But the Ikea furniture he had picked out with his fiancée and the bedding she and her mother bought in the United States are not going to be used in the empty apartment. That is only one of the many voids created by the deaths of 20-year-old Naava Appelbaum and her father, David, 50, who were laid to rest in Jerusalem last Wednesday.

Naava and David – the American-raised head of the emergency room at Shaare Tzedek Medical Center in Jerusalem and founder of a network of emergency medical service clinics – were among the seven Israelis killed in last Tuesday night's suicide bombing at Café Hillel on Emek Refaim Street in Jerusalem. They went out for hot drinks the night before Naava's wedding, which was to take place at Kibbutz Ramat Rachel in the Jerusalem area.

Colleagues and acquaintances said David was an intensely dedicated doctor who revolutionized the way emergency medicine is practised in Israel and who treated victims of almost every terror attack in the Jerusalem area over the last two decades. He was described as an unusually caring, attentive and energetic man, and as a knowledgeable and committed Jewish scholar.

David's oldest daughter, Naava, followed her father's model of devotion to others, spending time with children who have cancer as part of her national service duty. She was described as sweet and studious, fun but not frivolous. Her father recently said she was such a good daughter that she had never once given him cause to raise his voice.

The timing of their deaths seems almost too tragic to be true. A Jerusalem emergency room chief returns from New York, where he lectured at a Sept. 11 commemorative conference on how hospitals should deal with mass casualties, and is killed in a terror attack the night of his return. A young woman goes out to a café with her father and is blown up nearly beyond recognition the night before her wedding.

The enormity of the double loss was reflected in the eerie wailing of the many thousands who attended the funeral Wednesday. The crying intensified every time the eulogizers referred to the wedding that was never to be. David "was supposed to stand under his daughter's chupah," said former Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau at the funeral, "and is now lying, not standing, beside her."

But the atmosphere at the shivah house a few hours after the funeral was low-key and intimate, with family and close friends – including a couple who had flown in from London for the wedding – gathered in the living room and right outside the Jerusalem house.

On the patio, a hubbub was created not by mourners but by journalists crowding around pictures of the young couple and copies of the wedding invitation. The grief of the household was expressed in the traditional signs of mourning, including torn clothes and mourners sitting on or close to the ground, rather than in the public anguish so evident at the funeral. The eldest of David and Debra Appelbaum's six children, 24-year-old Natan, padded outside in his socks with two long gashes torn in his red-and-white checked shirt; Debra, wearing a jean skirt and colourful head scarf, brought out a low plastic stool to sit in the balmy afternoon air once most of the reporters had left.

Mourners attend the funeral of Naava and David Appelbaum Sept. 10, who, along with five others were killed by a suicide bomber in Jerusalem, five hours after eight soldiers died in the bombing of a bus stop outside Tzrifin, near Tel Aviv.

"We're not hysterical people," said Moshe Spero, Debra's brother, "but we're very emotionally torn."

Moshe, Debra and their brother Jonathan all live in Israel, along with their parents, Iris and Rabbi Shubert Spero, whose family helped found the Jewish Orthodox community in Cleveland. Shubert Spero led the Young Israel Congregation in Cleveland for 32 years, preaching aliyah from the pulpit and immigrating to Israel with his wife about 20 years ago. His family had earlier built a day school, yeshiva and mikvah in the Ohio city.

David Appelbaum's death will have an impact on everyone who lives in the Jerusalem area, said Dr. Todd Zalut, who began working with David more than a decade ago at the Terem network of emergency clinics that David founded and directed. Since last July, Zalut, who immigrated from Chicago and lives in Efrat, has been working with David in the Shaare Tzedek emergency room, where Zalut is assistant director.

"There's no question that we'll never recover," said Zalut. The emergency care at Shaare Tzedek and Terem "won't work at the same level as it has in the past," said Zalut, "and everybody in Jerusalem will suffer for it."

Back in the United States, David's home base was Chicago, where he studied in the Skokie Yeshiva with Rabbi Aaron Soloveitchik. Dr. Larry Hirsch, who has worked with David in emergency care since moving to Israel, said he still remembers David walking around the yeshiva with a big tape recorder to tape each of the rabbi's lectures. David later moved to Cleveland, where he went to medical school and met his wife Debra, and the couple immigrated to Israel in 1981.

David "was the perfect synthesis between very, very high-grade medicine, and dedication to the study of Torah and being a talmud chacham [Torah scholar]," said Rabbi Meyer Fendel, associate dean at Midreshet Moriah, a girls' seminary in Jerusalem where David was teaching Jewish medical ethics.

Once David moved to Israel, he initiated at least three major improvements in the country's emergency care: treating heart attack patients before they got to the hospital, establishing and directing Terem, and bringing the American electronic patient tracking system to the Shaare Tzedek emergency room.

"David revolutionized things in a lot of areas," said Hirsch.

Indeed, thousands of people owe David their gratitude, Prof. Jonathan Halevy, director-general of Shaare Tzedek, said at the funeral.

Around 1980, David co-wrote an article that was published in the New England Journal of Medicine demonstrating that patients had a better chance of surviving heart attacks if they were given the clot-buster agent streptokinase before they even got to the hospital. He began equipping ambulances in Jerusalem with the medication so that paramedics could start the IV, sometimes while the patient was still lying "on the couch in the family room," said Zalut.

"The faster the person gets the medication, the better the prognosis," Zalut said, adding that Jerusalem "was really the first place in the world" to adopt the practice, which it carried out throughout the 1980s and most of the '90s. It was only five to seven years ago that a new solution – angioplasty – began replacing the clot-busting agent, he said.

About a decade later, David began running emergency care clinics of his own. He got American investors to help finance his project, which he called Terem, a Hebrew acronym for "immediate medical treatment." There are now four Terem clinics in Jerusalem, and one each in Ma'aleh Adumim, Modi'in and Beit Shemesh – all with a high standard of care and a cost of no more than about NIS 200, compared to a hospital emergency room's minimum cost of about NIS 500, said Hirsch, who works in the Tel Hashomer emergency room and on a Jerusalem ambulance.

Last month, the Shaare Tzedek emergency room stopped using a handwritten system to track its patients and became the first hospital in Israel to use a sophisticated electronic tracking system, a device commonly used in America that David applied here.

The moment Zalut heard about the bomb Tuesday night, he called David's cell phone to see if he was on his way to the hospital. When he received no answer, it became clear that David was not going to be helping anyone else. Naava and her family had been busy making last-minute wedding arrangements – attaching ribbons to the place cards for 800 guests, making up the seating plan – when David decided he would "take his Navaleh out" for a late-night trip to Café Hillel, and then bring back some drinks for everyone who was still working on the wedding plans, said Iris Spero.

Zalut then called Debra, who told him that her husband and daughter had gone to a café near the bomb site. Zalut started calling the Jerusalem hospitals to find out if his co-worker was among the wounded. When no one reported seeing David at a hospital, Zalut called people at the scene and asked them to see if he was at the café – not as a doctor this time, but as a victim. Within a few minutes, David was confirmed dead. Later that night, Naava's body was identified as well.

A forecast for the future

It is once again my pleasure and privilege to wish all my readers a hearty Shanah Tovah Umetukah, a good and sweet year. Having written and spoken many times on the subject of the Jewish New Year, I asked myself just what is it that I could say to my readers this year that I have not said before?

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

As I look back and reread some of my previous pronouncements, I find that the certitude with which I frequently approached my task is no longer there.

Maybe I wore different glasses then, a pair that gave me a special vision of the future. Well, dear friends, I have to disappoint you. I am no longer sure that my foresight is good. I only know that I can look back with a sense of sureness.

Yet, regarding tomorrow, I am sure about one thing, which I will be glad to share with you.

It is my conviction that we Jews are a people who are going to be here tomorrow and the day after – that is, for the duration of history. In that respect, I will call Jews eternal. Of course, a statement like this is unprovable, for today it is nothing but belief, and only future generations will be able to judge its accuracy. Yet, provable or not, my conviction is rooted in faith.

I believe we Jews are forever, unless we ourselves want to quit. And I am sure that this will never happen. Our slogan is "Chizku v'imtzu", which means "Be strong and keep it up!"

I suspect that there are non-Jews who would consider this belief to be a mixture of arrogance and false hope. However, we Jews have learned that our perception of Jewish destiny is, for many people, quite incomprehensible – as, regretfully, it is so for some Jews who reject the idea of being part of a "chosen people" and similar traditional opinions.

Whether or not we, as a people, have a special supernatural connection remains a matter of belief. Future generations will be able to judge the realism of such faith.

None of us who are alive today will be around when history will pronounce its judgement. But I am not fearful that we will be considered unrealistic dreamers. I do worry, however, that many Jews do not understand the full significance of our mission. Fortunately, the number of such people appears to be dwindling, and I trust that the number of believers will grow as the years go by.

Seeing the world in a different light

As the leaves start drifting towards the ground, the air takes on its habitual crispness, and fall once again breathes its icy whispers into my ear.

The start of another school year signals yet another season of deluding myself that perhaps this time, things will be different.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

It has always made so much more sense to me that the new year begins in September rather than in January.

Nothing feels different when you wake up on Jan. 1. But something about the change that occurs in September is positively magical.

School really can be as rejuvenating as buying new clothes, textbooks and writing utensils, I tell myself earnestly.

And I slip into the lecture seats of yet another class waiting to be provoked, challenged and inspired – only to have my hopes dashed to the ground, as yet another droning academic who has been closeted in the ivory tower for the last 30 years takes his place at the podium.

The things that have formed the deepest imprint on my life have often happened outside the classroom. I realize this especially when I look back at the last year since I started writing my column.

I have kept many of the letters my readers have written to me. They are poignant, sweet, funny, angry, defensive – so typically Jewish in so many ways, so representative of what it means to be a Jew in this day and age.

It's true that I have received letters from the odd lunatic, and even a couple of marriage proposals from desperate parents on behalf of their poor, unsuspecting sons.

But for the most part, my letters have been absolute gems – giving me that provocation and inspiration I have looked for so long in other places.

Here are some excerpts of a few of my favorites:

"There is a concept that there is a spark deep in the soul of every Jew, and that even if someone is not conscious of it, that quiet ember can never be extinguished and is waiting to be fully ignited."

"Jews are incredibly successful in every field we've chosen. I've read that, although we comprise about one-half of one per cent of the earth's population, 25 per cent of the Nobel Prize winners have been Jewish!"

"I hate hearing about interfaith dating and intermarriage and wish I could reach everyone who doesn't care about being Jewish. I truly believe that we are so lucky to have been born into this very exclusive 'club' – a club that does not easily accept new members."

"Recently in Toronto, I saw some graffiti – it was a Star of David and underneath was the word 'devils.' I was so furious, I pulled out a black marker, scratched the word devils out and inside the star wrote: 'Jews are great.'"

"I often feel scared that I'm not going to find anyone. I have tons of friends all over the place, none being Jewish, so that definitely limits my options for Jewish guys. I too have that typical family that says, 'Oy, bring Bubbie home a nice Jewish boy.'"

"If Jews had no more than a shared history and gene pool, you might be right that limiting yourself to Jewish men could be considered enthnocentric in today's world.

"Still, you must be aware of the fact that over the centuries, Jews were frequently threatened with death if they refused to convert to another religion.

"In hundreds or thousands of such cases, they willingly chose death. Surely, the value that these people put on their Judaism was far beyond ethnic and cultural considerations."

"If you pride yourself on being a Jew, you will stop your efforts to reason with people who represent an evil cause which seeks to achieve its goals with evil methods."

I can't say that I always agree with my readers. But your letters are – and have always been – highly valued.

This month marks the end of a year since I started writing my column for The CJN.

It is also the beginning of another – one in which I hope to continue to inspire and challenge you to see the world in a different light, as you have done so often for me.

Striking a balance

As sad as it is to see summer end, there is always something nice about the cool breeze of autumn. Soaking up the sunshine in Halifax (a rarity in itself), I can't help but enjoy the transition from summer to fall and home to school.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

For the Jewish students of Halifax, there is a ton to be excited about. While the double cohort wreaked havoc on some students, it helped motivate a large number of Jewish students to look beyond Ontario and Quebec to the smaller provinces of the East Coast. The growing numbers and enthusiastic frosh provide tremendous promise for the New Year.

At the centre of the excitement is our very own house. For the first time, the Jewish students of Halifax have a place to call their own: a two-storey house close to the campus that will undoubtedly become the centre of great things. Thanks to the generosity of the Latner Foundation and the unending support of the Atlantic Jewish Community and UIA, the potential for Jewish student life in Halifax has been acknowledged.

The feeling is contagious. Our first meeting in the house brought new and old faces, all connected by a common enthusiasm about the great things to come. There is excitement about the things we will accomplish and the knowledge of the responsibility with which we are faced.

Entering my third year of school, I too feel the tension. As the light at the end of the undergraduate tunnel grows brighter, I am looking to the future with greater anticipation. The pressure is there. Just as the Jewish Student Association stands at a point where students are taking the reins and choosing the direction toward which we will run, my friends and I are faced with a similar challenge.

Until now, things have been relatively simple. The challenge was ensuring that course prerequisites were met. There was room to dabble, change your major and procrastinate when considering what was waiting at the end of university. The first two years sped by, and serve as a reminder of how fast the next two will also pass. While this means the underlying fire is starting to get a little hotter, it necessarily follows that the excitement level is also rising.

It's always a challenge to think about the future. To imagine where you want to be and face decisions that appear to have permanent consequences no matter what path you choose. While a little scary, it is a great feeling to know you are closer to adulthood and independence than you were. Undergraduate life is amazing, but it can't last forever. So, you have to enjoy it, all the while ensuring that you don't get so caught up you forget there's a real world outside its invisible borders.

After two years of involvement in organized Jewish student life, I am amazed by the transformation that has occurred so rapidly, and gleeful when I think of what lies in store for the future. As I write this column, news from Israel could not be much worse. Palestinian prime minister Mahmoud Abbas has just resigned and an onslaught of violence has begun. The future is uncertain to say the least, but there remains much in our control and much to look forward to.

With a new group of students coming to university and developing the opinions and theories that will forever influence them, we have to relish the little power we have. Through Birthright, education and Yiddishkeit, we can try to ensure that the next generation of Jewish leaders will feel the compassion displayed by our elders and will be willing and able to pursue the challenges that lie before us.

We never thought Jewish students would have a house of their own in Halifax. While infinitely smaller in scale, our perseverance to have a place of our own, our understanding that Jewish students need to have a common, independent ground, mirrors the perseverance we have seen for over 50 years as we have watched the battles to ensure that all Jews will have a common, independent ground to call home.

We cannot know what the future holds, but we can continue to fight for the ideals we know to be true, and ensure that we, as individuals and as a community, continue as best we can to accomplish all that we are capable of.

The Kirshner File

Israel launches a war against Hamas

Sheldon Kirshner
in Toronto

Israel's deadly, long-simmering battle with Hamas, its most potent Palestinian enemy, has exploded into a brutal full-scale war.

On Sept. 1, after months of mounting provocations, Israel officially declared war on Hamas and on Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, which have claimed responsibility for virtually all the suicide bombings since the eruption of the Palestinian uprising three years ago.

Israel took this drastic step after last month's devastating bombing in Jerusalem and the collapse of the hudna, the temporary ceasefire brokered by Egypt on June 29.

Since then, Israel has killed more than a dozen Hamas leaders and threatened to invade Gaza, a hotbed of Islamic fundamentalism and a Hamas stronghold. In the latest developments, Israel tried but failed to kill Mahmoud al-Zahar and Sheik Ahmed Yassin, two of the founders of Hamas. On Sept. 6, an Israeli F-16 jet bombed a building where Yassin was having lunch. He was slightly wounded. Four days later, an F-16 hit Zahar's home, injuring him and his wife and killing his grown son.

Yassin, Hamas' spiritual leader, promised to exact retribution. "The Israeli people," he warned, "will pay a high price." He was true to his chilling words. On Sept. 9, Palestinian bombers struck a crowded bus stop adjacent to an army base near Rishon Lezion and a popular cafe in Jerusalem, killing a total of 15 people.

Prior to these attacks, Israel had imposed yet another closure on the West Bank and Gaza, stepped up patrols along the Green Line and increased security for Israeli cabinet ministers, whom Hamas has threatened.

In a hard-hitting speech before the newest round of violence, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon put Hamas leaders on notice that they were "marked for death," and would not be given "a moment's rest." Laying down a tough new policy, he asserted, " We will continue to hunt them down because they have only one goal: the destruction of Israel."

Israel's struggle with Hamas, which really began following the outbreak of the second intifadah, took a quantum leap in June when Abdel Aziz Rantissi, one of its top strategists, became the object of a targeted assassination.

In its wake, Hamas issued a dire threat. It would reduce Israel to "blood and ruins." As usual, Israel considered this a serious threat. Some days later, a Hamas suicide bomber blew up a bus in Jerusalem, killing 16 passengers. In response, Israel vowed to "wipe out" Hamas, saying that every Hamas militant was a target, from the lowliest member to Yassin himself. But Israel postponed its anticipated invasion of Gaza when Egypt launched a sustained effort to bring about the hudna.

The flawed truce was less than a respite and, for Hamas, it was an exercise in compromise. Hamas, the Islamic Resistance Movement, unequivocally rejects Israel's existence and regards Israel as an illegitimate state occupying Palestinian lands. Sheik Assad Tamimi, the Islamic Jihad leader, spoke for his fellow rejectionists when he said: "The Jews have to return to the countries from which they came. We shall not accede to a Jewish state on our land, even if it is only in one village."

Founded in 1987 during the opening days of the first intifadah, Hamas is dedicated to the establishment of an Islamic state in Israel, the West Bank and Gaza. Under Yassin's leadership, Hamas opposed the 1991 Madrid peace conference, the Olso peace process and, now, the road map, the internationally sponsored peace plan supported by the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia. Hamas has consistently sought to sabotage the peace process. Recently, Colin Powell, the U.S. secretary of state, denounced Hamas as "the major obstacle" to peace.

Despite its rejectionist position, Hamas is capable of flashes of pragmatism. Cognizant of Israel's military strength, Yassin has, in the past, expressed a readiness to enter into a long-term truce with Israel, provided Israel withdraws from all the territories, including eastern Jerusalem, and allows the Palestinians to create an independent state. But in its heart of hearts, Hamas does not accept Israel's existence. Hamas, nevertheless, agreed to the hudna, pressured to do so by the Palestinian Authority and Egypt. Yet by any yardstick, this was a faux truce, honoured in the breach by Palestinian gunmen and bombers.

Not being a signatory to the hudna, Israel continued to hunt for suspected suicide bombers ("ticking bombs"), their handlers and bomb factories.

The PA's refusal to dismantle the terrorist infrastructure, as called for by the road map, exacerbated the situation on the ground. Israel was compelled to target bombers preparing fresh attacks.

Such a person was Mohammed Sidr, the Islamic Jihad commander in Hebron. He was killed in mid-August after resisting arrest. His demise may have been a turning point in Israel's increasingly bitter confrontation with Hamas. In the aftermath of his death, Islamic Jihad promised "an earthquake in the heart of the Zionist entity."

On Aug. 19, Islamic Jihad and Hamas claimed credit for the Jerusalem bus bombing that killed 23 Israelis. It is a toll that almost matches the 2002 Passover massacre in Netanya. Avenging the August bombing, Israel took out Ismail Abu Shanab, an important Hamas figure close to Yassin.

After Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade collectively renounced the hudna on Aug. 21, Israel warned that unless the PA cracked down on Hamas, it would press on with operations against the radicals. Fearing a civil war, Mahmoud Abbas, the first, but ineffectual, PA prime minister, made it abundantly clear that he would not disarm the militants.

Sheik Ahmed Yassin

Israel subsequently launched an offensive, picking off Hamas activists. Hamas fired mortars and Qassem rockets into southern Israel and Gaza, and the conflict escalated, imperilling the already shaky road map.

Since the beginning of September, the situation has deteriorated sharply on all fronts. On the day the Israeli cabinet declared an all-out war on Hamas and simultaneously froze the diplomatic process with the PA, Israel's chief of staff, Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, pointedly disclosed that he had readied a brigade for a possible invasion of Gaza to uproot the terrorist infrastructure. Israel was poised to invade Gaza last year, but held off in deference to the United States.

Israel may yet launch an invasion. It would probably be modelled after last year's Operation Defensive Shield and Operation Determined Path in the West Bank.

Barring an invasion, Israel is expected to hit Hamas relentlessly. Since the eruption of the current intifadah, Israel has disposed of several key Hamas operatives, notably Salah Shehada, Ibrahim Maqadmeh, Mahmoud Abu Hanoud, Kayes Adwan and Ayman Halaweh. However, Mohammed Dief, one of Hamas' leading commanders, has eluded Israel. Last September, an Israeli Apache helicopter struck Dief's car, but he managed to escape and now is in hiding, like many of Hamas' top-tier leaders. According to reports, they have shaved their beards, donned disguises and begun using mopeds for basic transportation.

The war that Israel has initiated against the terrorist infrastructure in Gaza is largely the result of the PA's obdurate refusal to disarm groups such as Hamas. Even before he tendered his resignation on Sept. 6, due to PA President Yasser Arafat's absolute refusal to cede control of the PA's security agencies, Abbas was reluctant to crack down on Hamas. "This government does not deal with opposition groups with a policing mentality but with a mentality of dialogue," Abbas said.

But the PA's attempt to co-opt Hamas has been a resounding failure. During the winter of 1996, for example, Hamas and Islamic Jihad killed 60 civilians in four closely sequenced suicide attacks in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. The PA arrested scores of militants and closed mosques where inflammatory anti-Israel sermons had been delivered. But in a "revolving door" policy, the PA soon released their prisoners. As for Arafat, whom Israel has resolved to "remove" from the scene, he has never abandoned his penchant for violence. Last week, Israel's deputy prime minister, Ehud Olmert, said that Arafat may have to be physically eliminated in order to advance the peace process.

Ahmed Qureia, the PA's second prime minister, is one of the architects of Oslo, and was a participant in the 2000 Camp David summit in the United States. He believes the Palestinians should try to achieve statehood through diplomacy. But like Abbas, he opposes the use of force to subdue Hamas and its violence-prone allies.

This leaves Israel with no alternative but to pursue these groups remorselessly. Yet in targeting the rejectionist wing of the Palestinian national movement, Israel is chipping away at the PA, its sole negotiating partner. It is also eroding the road map, which looks like road kill today, and deepening its occupation of the territories, which is antithetical to its interests as a Jewish state.

These crucial issues will have to be addressed sooner or later. For now, though, Israel is engaged in an existential life-and-death struggle with rapacious enemies that deny its existence.

The Jewish Education Report

A Time to Celebrate Goodness

Baila Lubek
Chair,

Board of Jewish Education

Seymour Epstein, Ed.D.
Executive Director,
UJA Federation
Board of Jewish Education

Here we are at the beginning of a new year; both the school year and 5764, Rosh Hashana.

This year, the BJE staff has decided to study Howard Gardner's latest book, The Disciplined Mind - a summary of this famous educator's philosophy of education. Professor Gardner is the man who revealed the importance of the multiple intelligence theory to schooling. He proposes, in this latest volume, that all education should be based on the true, the beautiful, and the good. Of course, he leaves the definitions of those qualities up to any individual culture, but he does believe that learning must be based on these three pillars. It is the last one that has special significance at this time of year, because Rosh Hashana reminds us of the place that "goodness" has in the Biblical creation story. It is God who introduces the value judgment that the world is good, even going so far as to say that it is very good on the day that humans were created, Rosh Hashana. Ever since that utterance, we have felt the power to judge goodness (or its lack) in the world around us. This ability to discern should not be taken lightly. It is the first lesson we learn in our Biblical tradition, and Gardner is correct in asserting its primacy in our schools. It is in that spirit that we wish all of you -parents, teachers and students, a Shana Tova, a good year!

Where are They Now?

Since Toronto's Jewish school system was established many decades ago, thousands of graduates have achieved enormous success in business, public life and community affairs. In this feature, we will be profiling some our Jewish education success stories.

Jewish education is a life-long asset

by Suzanne Wintrob

A younger Hershell Ezrin

Hershell Ezrin truly believes that his day school education helped him achieve great things.

"Because we had to compact two school days into one, I learned how to apply myself and be very disciplined and concentrated in my work," says Ezrin, one of Canada's best known political advisors and public policy experts, who now heads up Toronto-based consulting firm GPC International and serves as consultant to the new Israel Emergency Cabinet. "I know that it was my day school experience that allows me to be able to balance large numbers of different things."

But equally important, he adds, was the Jewish pride that day school instilled in him from a very young age: "It's a pride I've been able to carry with me in all of my jobs and all of my living situations here in Canada and abroad. It made me feel more qualified to be able to explain to other people why I feel proud to be Jewish and why I feel so strongly about Israel."

Ezrin, who grew up in downtown Toronto, began school at Brunswick Talmud Torah (which later became Associated Hebrew Schools). He and his classmates moved to Shaarei Shomayim Congregation on St. Clair Avenue for their Grade 8 year and became the first Grade 9 class to attend Associated's newly constructed Neptune Avenue campus in 1957.

"It was a remarkably intense learning environment with absolutely brilliant teachers," recalls Ezrin, 56. "My only regret now is that I wasn't able to take more advantage of these people, like Avraham Shkop who taught Bible Studies and Rabbi Gedalia Felder who taught Gemara. These men were geniuses. On the other hand, day school was also my introduction into a lifelong hatred of the Tam Tam cracker because that's all we ever got as a snack. To this day it's a joke in our family that no Tam Tams are allowed."

Ezrin did indeed achieve great things after high school. He received an Honours BA in history from the University of Toronto, a Masters degree in history from Carleton University and then took on a host of diplomatic and political postings, first in India and then as Canadian Consul in Los Angeles and New York City, head of the Canadian Unity Information Office in the Trudeau era, press spokesperson for the federal government in New York during the first referendum, and Deputy Minister to former Ontario Premier David Peterson. Ezrin moved into the private sector in 1988 and joined GPC International in 1998.

Ezrin's busy life has taken him to many far-flung places, and all too often his day school grounding kicks in and leads to some of his most memorable experiences.

"I seek out the synagogues in almost every new city I visit," says Ezrin, now a father of two grown daughters. "I might not speak the local language but we always have Hebrew or Yiddish."

Camps Offer Much More than Summer Fun

The summer of 2003 may have been a break from school, but not a break from learning.

This past summer, hundreds of Ontario Jewish campers did much more than learn to sing, swim and water ski. Judaism was also on the agenda, albeit wrapped up in fun and games.

Here's what happened while your kids were away:

Reliving Israel's History

One of Camp Moshava's goals is to broaden a camper's Jewish experiences all within the framework of informal Jewish education. "Kids go to school 10 months of the year so they certainly don't need to go another two months in the summer," says Camp Moshava director Miriam Allman. "But camp is an opportunity for learning and broadening our campers' horizons in ways that are not possible during the school year."

Each year Camp Moshava, an Orthodox camp near Peterborough, Ontario chooses a central theme based on the history of Israel (from Biblical to modern times) "that children can sink their teeth into," says Allman. This year's theme dealt with Jewish life in pre-statehood Israel from 1881-1948.

As always, the theme was introduced at the start of camp with bus passes, which this year resembled passports from Poland, Russia and Germany. The buses made an "unexpected" stop at a park just outside of camp, where counselors boarded dressed as immigrants from those countries and spoke to the children about why they were forced to leave their hometowns.

Moshava maintained the theme throughout the summer with daily themed programming, introduction of the Hebrew word of the day and various other activities. The third youngest section (Eidah Bet) planted trees as the chalutzim (early pioneers) once did in order to drain the swamps. The 14 to15 year olds built a watchtower like the newcomers to Israel did to ward off enemies and the entire camp re-enacted the United Nations vote to form the State of Israel. Moshava's second oldest campers learned the importance of Tikkun Olam (repairing the world) with their visit to a nursing home dressed as clowns to liven up the day of the patients. During Colour War each team painted a creative, theme-related sign to close the competition. Their themes included pluralism in Israel today and the importance of those who defend our country. The educational staff, headed by Moshava's rabbi from Israel counted among its members Israelis who brought a unique perspective to campers.

A Biblical Summer

At Camp Ramah, a Conservative camp located near Bracebridge, Ontario, each eidah (section) had a Biblical theme of its own.

Nitzanim, the youngest campers finishing Grades 3 and 4, studied the stories of Ruth and Jonah through games and values discussions. Arazim campers, completing Grade 5, learned about Jewish history and Judaism's role in the environment. Campers from Kfirim, who were finishing Grade 6, took the first steps towards their Bar and Bat Mitzvahs with discussions and activities related to Jewish identity and Jewish law. They also worked with author and poet Danny Segal on a number of tzedaka (charity) projects.

Tzirim, representing students finishing Grade 7, were immersed in teshuva (repentance), tefilla (prayer) and tzedaka and created their own siddurim with visiting Jerusalem artist David Moss. Nachshonim, who head to camp for the whole summer following Grade 8, studied Torah values and family relationships, designed ketubot (marriage contracts) with Moss and havdalah spice boxes with Segal.

Campers completed Grade 9 in Magshimim, also worked on various projects with Segal and took elective courses designed by their counselors and teachers, while members of the oldest group, Alonim, focused their summer on Biblical Leadership.

Creating Community

Camp George near Parry Sound, the only Reform camp of its kind in Canada, took yet another approach by spending each summer session on a different theme. July's central theme was kehilla (community), which incorporated discussions on God, Torah and Israel.

Karen Collins, assistant camp director, says the theme was introduced to campers through three weekly shiurim (lessons) and then woven into every aspect of camp life, from the kitchen to the arts and crafts area and everywhere in between. On the ropes course, for example, campers pulled together to feel the sense of community, while the youngest campers learned about diverse Jewish communities living in Israel and then created their own Moroccan wedding, complete with jewelry and food for the bride and groom.

The theme for August was Tzelem Elokim (living in the image of God), with innovative ideas put in place for campers to enjoy. Campers built their own garden as part of the summer's new unit on Jewish education and environmental awareness. Says Collins: "It taught them about sustainable development and sharing in the world's resources."

Jewish Education On the Move

Major Community Effort to Solve Tuition Challenge

There's no doubt that Jewish life is expensive, what with JCC membership, summer camp and, of course, school tuition.

Given the recent fee increases that have hit many of Toronto's Jewish day schools, the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and other community stakeholders have been working tirelessly to help parents better afford to send their children to day school.

"There's a tremendous amount of energy that our staff and lay people have put in over the years," says BJE executive director Seymour Epstein, a.k.a. Epi. "Universal access to Jewish education is our ultimate goal because it represents the strongest guarantee of a thriving Jewish future."

Unfortunately, says Epi, there is no single answer to the tuition fee challenge. Withholding fees, he says, won't reduce tuition but will only aggravate the financial pressure that day schools face. Without government funding, which exists in most other jurisdictions, a system that offers two streams of instruction in a private setting will always be costly, he adds, and that's why the Ontario Equity in Education Tax Credit is so important.

What's needed, he insists, is a variety of complementary responses.

"We need higher day school enrollment from the beginning in senior kindergarten and Grade 1, designated funding for schools to be available as Jewish neighbourhoods expand, and innovate funding options, such as education endowments," says Epi. "BJE is taking a proactive approach by working closely with our schools, the UJA Federation Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative, and the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education. Our schools strive to be cost-efficient and we work with them to develop their budgets accordingly. And we're working on strategic long-term fundraising so that 5, 10 and 15 years from now our schools will have endowed funds to ensure quality Jewish education for everyone."

This academic year, UJA Federation will be allocating nearly $8 million in tuition subsidies for parents who can't afford full fees at Jewish day schools. That's a $900,000 increase over last year and comes almost exclusively from UJA Federation's annual campaign. More than 2,300 students, or 31 per cent of the student population, at 13 BJE-funded day schools received subsidies last year. UJA Federation is allocating another $3 million for other educational programming beyond subsidies, making Jewish education its largest single domestic allocation.

Aaron Blumenfeld, co-president of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS) which worked with the provincial government on the Equity in Education Tax Credit issue, feels the fair funding effort was successful primarily because all of the community groups – parents, schools, religious and community organizations – acted with a unified voice in dealing with the government.

"When fully implemented in 2006, the tax credit will make Jewish education much more affordable, reducing the after-tax cost of an elementary school education by as much as $3,500 per year," says Blumenfeld. "The stakeholder groups, including parents, schools and community organizations, can work together to alleviate the strain that rising tuitions are placing on many middle class families, and OAJDS is prepared to assist in coordinating the schools' efforts in this regard."

Adds Epi, "We are all committed to universal access. We all care about high costs and want our schools to be both effective and efficient. Even with all our differences in ideology and religious practice, we are truly one on this issue."

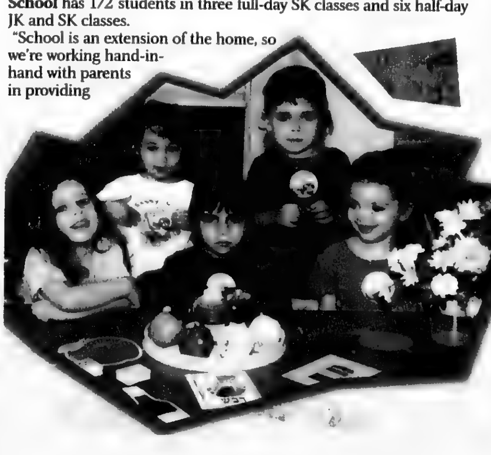
Jewish Pre-School is A Huge Hit

by Suzanne Wintrob

They may be small but they're big on learning. This year, Jewish preschools are brimming at the seams as many more families are choosing to start their children early on a lifetime of Jewish learning.

At Netivot HaTorah Day School, for instance, response to last year's nursery school launch was so overwhelming that a second classroom was added this year to meet demand. Associated Hebrew Schools (AHS) now has 350 students enrolled in two full-day junior kindergarten (JK) classes and five full-day senior kindergarten (SK) classes plus 10 half-day nursery, JK and SK classes. The Leo Baeck Day School is also hopping with 110 students enrolled in a half-day JK class and five full-day SK classes, while Bialik Hebrew Day School has 172 students in three full-day SK classes and six half-day JK and SK classes.

"School is an extension of the home, so we're working hand-in-hand with parents in providing children with a whole Jewish experience," says Eileen Goldstein, preschool coordinator at Netivot HaTorah Day School. "It's a true partnership so children get one clear message at school and at home."



While older day school students delve into Jewish texts and issues, Jewish preschool is where kids get the basics. Much of the curriculum is built around the Jewish calendar, lifecycle events, Israel and Hebrew language, all taught through songs, stories, art and a host of other methods.

And if that's not enough learning for three, four and five-year-olds, there's also a strong emphasis on English literacy, math, science and technology. Children who graduate from preschool are well prepared for Grade One and beyond. Leo Baeck not only introduced Parashat Hashavua (weekly Bible portion) and new Jewish music at the preschool level this year but also expanded its early literacy program to include leveled early readers. Netivot, which saw preschool enrollment climb 40 per cent this year to 145 students, has taken a unique approach by running Hebrew immersion at all levels, while Bialik is continuing its efforts in oral Hebrew language as well as the core arts and sciences subjects.

Suri Nagel, vice-principal of the AHS preschool, adds that full-day programs allow teachers to expand on all of these topics and offer more one-on-one time with children who need it.

"Our children learn that they're part of a very special community because everything we do relates to who we are as Jews," says Leo Baeck director Zita Gardner. "The environment in which they're learning is infused, both pictorially and in language, with Shabbat, holy days, Israel, Hebrew language, Jewish heritage and customs. Their whole learning and socialization experience happens within a Jewish framework. When the celebration of Rosh Hashana takes place in school and at home, what a wonderfully powerful message that gives to young children."

Hasty Market ends ties to Thornhill store

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Employee alleged to have made disparaging comments against Jews

Hasty Market, an Ontario convenience store chain, has severed its relationship with one of its store licensees over an employee's alleged comments that disparaged Jews.

But the employee, who declined to give his name, denied making remarks that targeted Jews. He claimed instead that head office decided for business reasons to cancel its relationship with the store where he works.

The incident that prompted the "he said/she said" controversy occurred about two weeks ago when a customer entered the Thornhill store to purchase two packs of cigarettes. E.M., who asked that her full name not be used, said that when she commented about the high price of the cigarettes, she was startled by the employee's sharp response.

"He started yelling at me that it was the 'goddamn Jews' who owned all the real estate within a three-mile radius and they're gouging everyone," she recalled.

"My mouth just stopped open. I had never heard anything like that before."

When she complained about his remarks, "he walked around the counter and screamed, 'Get out of my store.'"

E.M. brought her concerns to the attention of Canadian Jewish Congress, which relayed them to Nameh Jabbour, president of Hasty Market Corporation.

In a letter to Jabbour, Len Rudner, Congress' director of community relations, quoted the employee's remarks, asked that the matter be investigated and suggested steps be taken to maintain the company's reputation.

In a written reply to Rudner, Jabbour stated he had investigated the incident and "I was met with similar views to those expressed in your letter.

"As a corporation, we certainly do not condone nor approve the views expressed in your letter attributed to the store operator nor any views that express intolerance or bigotry. As you may appreciate, as a corporation whose business is in the service of literally tens of thousands of people in our stores every day, we would and will take issue with any views expressed by those associated with our company that brings our company in disrepute in the community."

Hasty Market quickly required that the store sign be removed.

When asked to comment on the remarks attributed to him, the store employee said, "It is a lie.

"The story is based on a false accusation," he said, adding it would make no sense for him to utter such a remark since "the majority of my customers are Jewish. I would be acting against my customers."

The employee, who said he was related to the store owner, said he would like to meet the customer who registered the complaint, "to make sure she understands me and that I do not speak [against] the Jewish community."

"As far as the Jewish community is, I have nothing against it," he said, adding he has been a human rights activist.

E.M. said she had no interest in meeting the employee.

"I've never had an experience like that in my life. It was a horrible experience… very upsetting," she said.

Rudner said Congress is "impressed and pleased with the quick response of Hasty Market to this matter. It is clear Mr. Jabbour is a responsible corporate citizen who acted quickly to maintain the reputation of his company and to send a very clear message that Canada is a tolerant society."

VAUGHAN MAYOR MEETS WITH JEWISH COMMUNITY: More than 200 members of the Thornhill Jewish community came out for a "meet and greet" evening with Vaughan Mayor Michael Di Biase, right, on Sept. 9. The event, which featured a cocktail reception and presentations by Di Biase and local rabbis, took place at Chabad@Flamingo in Thornhill. Pictured with the mayor are Thornhill resident and event organizer Leslie Fluxgold, left, and Rabbi Mendel Kaplan of Chabad@Flamingo. [Photo courtesy Chabad@Flamingo]

Jewish Life

Rosh Hashanah resolutions

Books
Bernard Baskin

How are we to order or govern our lives in the next 12 months? Consider the following:

- Spend some time alone. Rabbi Nachman of Bratslav taught, "Someone who does not reserve one hour every day for oneself is not human." Happy is the person who can call a few hours a day his very own – away from the frenzied, insistent demands of family, business and community. Why should the din and tumult of society stifle the nobler promptings of the heart?
- Maintain your individuality. No two people are identical. Imitation may be the source of popularity, but not of greatness.

An ancient rabbi taught: "What a difference between an earthly king and the King of the Universe." A monarch mints coins upon which he stamps his image. They are all alike. But when the King of the Universe creates men and women in his image – untold millions of them – no two are exactly alike. God made us different. It is a divine right.

- Read a good book periodically. A house without books is like a room without windows. Bereft of the inspiration, information and delight of books, human growth and progress is slowed.

We may not agree with the philosopher who wrote: "If all the crowns of Europe were placed at my disposal on condition that I should abandon my books and studies, I should spurn the crowns and stand by the books." But we must surely agree that the person who doesn't read good books has no advantage over the person who can't read them.

- Avoid a static mind. Life is all about flux and alteration. Immobility of thought or imagination means death. Properly considered, life is not about having and getting, but about being and becoming. There is no hope for the satisfied person – and self-complacency is the companion of ignorance.
- Eliminate envy from your life. It is an ignoble passion that wastes time and energy and consumes its victims with hatred. Envy blinds us to our own virtues and blessings and magnifies those of our neighbour – his crops are always better and his cows always give more milk. The Talmud states that when the envious camel demanded horns, they cut off his ears.
- Cultivate the art of tolerance. We are all passengers on the spaceship Earth. Because we live within a stone's throw of each other is no reason to throw stones at each other. We must learn how to accept and tolerate the faults and foibles of others, if our own infirmities and errors are to be accepted in turn. Most of us have committed the Golden Rule to memory. When are we going to commit it to life? As Leo Baeck said, "Those who hold connections, respect connections."
- Make optimism, rather then pessimism, your daily philosophy. Benjamin Disraeli cited the following as the national motto of England: "Something will turn up." Pollyannaism must be shunned, but optimism is the spur to all creativity.

Ours may not be the best of all possible worlds, just the one we must make the best of, as illustrated by the story of two travellers, one a veteran and the other a novice, who were climbing in the Pyrenees. One night, they were forced to sleep on a rock where the winds howled and wailed. The frightened novice cried out, "I think this must be the end." "Oh, no," said the veteran, "This is how dawn arrives in the Pyrenees."

- Adopt a spiritual attitude toward life. At its best, such an attitude says "yes" to the universe. An open hand accomplishes more than a closed fist. This means that despite its manifold secrets and mysteries, the world displays order and makes sense. As Rabbi Akiva used to say, "Just as a door testifies that it has a carpenter, and a coat testifies that it has a weaver, so does the existence of the world testify that it has a creator."

Every tomorrow has two handles. We can take hold of it by the handle of anxiety or by the handle of faith. The world may be hard to explain with God, but it's impossible to understand without Him.

Find your family's passenger list

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

During my ongoing research into the history of my mother's huge Toronto mispoche, I have attempted to locate as many ships' passenger manifests as possible that show the arrival of relatives to Canada from their various towns in Belarus, beginning about a century ago.

The recently established Web site of the National Archives' Canadian Genealogy Centre (www.genealogy.gc.ca) has helped enormously in this regard. Thanks to a joint project of the Jewish genealogical societies of Ottawa and Montreal, the site offers an index of about 200,000 Canadian naturalizations that occurred between 1915 and 1932.

In short, it's a gold mine of national heritage.

It costs $5 to apply to Ottawa for copies of the paperwork behind each naturalization. The result is a sheaf of papers that may include the immigrant's original application or petition for naturalization, a standard police report on the applicant, a handwritten oath of allegiance, a list of children and birth dates, and not-always-reliable details about the applicant's birth and entry into Canada.

The documents typically contain sentences like: "I was born at Bobruisk in the country of Russia on the 5th day of October 1887," and "I arrived at the port of Quebec on the vessel SS Corsican on or about the 1st day of August 1909."

No true genealogist can read the latter pronouncement without rushing to the nearest convenient library – for me, the North York Central Library in Toronto – that holds a set of the National Archives' microfilms of passenger arrivals to Canadian ports.

If researching passenger lists is often compared to seeking out a needle in a haystack, knowing the name of the ship and a range of dates generally reduces the size of the haystack to manageable proportions.

At the library, a finding aid indicates that Quebec manifests dating from July 25 and August 30, 1909 will be found on microfilm T-4762. The researcher threads the reel onto a microfilm reader and begins scanning pages, stopping only to read the vessel's name at the front of each new manifest. Luckily, the SS Corsican quickly appears, and a much slower scan of passengers soon turns up the sought-after relatives.

There the serendipity ends, however, because some lazy purser listed initials – I., R., L., N., Iz., G. and S. – instead of first names. Since all Jews have at least three names (Gershon, Tsvi, Hersh or Israel all being reasonable equivalents of "Harry" for example), the puzzle requires careful study of the columns showing age, sex and marital status.

But searches typically involve much more effort than in that example. Some time ago, I learned that a great-aunt gave birth to a daughter aboard ship while crossing the Atlantic, on Feb. 29 of a leap year. Pinpointing the years to either 1904 or 1908, I've searched the records of all obvious ships upon which the mother could have had a "berth," but have had no luck as yet. It hasn't been the cinch I imagined.

Even when armed with details from a naturalization file, the genealogist may still need to scroll through microfilms for hours if key details are inaccurate. The reward, however, will usually justify the effort.

The following are family surnames of Jewish arrivals at Halifax aboard the SS Numidian or the SS Grampian on Jan. 19 and Jan. 25, 1908, respectively:

- Going to Montreal or elsewhere in Quebec were Bergin, Feinstein, Israel, Karnker, Lischisky, Mizicofsky, Rosenberg, Rubin, Turlin, Weinberg and Zaslansky.
- Heading to Toronto or elsewhere in Ontario were Cagman, Schipper and Wiseman.
- Going to Winnipeg were Auerbach, Chuslowsky, Freimann, Gicharman, Goldenberg, Halperin, Ibarz, Margulis, Schalman and Schwarzmann.
- Heading to St. John, N.B. were Bialick and Zelesman.

If this column leads you to find a ship manifest for your family, please let me know. A good year to all.

Samuel Oziel remembered

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

In the Shabbat morning service, there is one custom that brilliantly captures the essence of Sephardi culture. It happens during the reading of the Torah. When a man is called for an aliyah, his children, grandchildren, even great-grandchildren if he has any, as well as his sons-in-law, nephews and younger brothers, all stand up. They remain standing until the end of the aliyah, at which time they kiss him on both cheeks! It is a magnificent expression of family solidarity, warmth and honour.

Growing up in Petach Tikvah, I vividly recall the many occasions when the late Samuel Oziel was called for an aliyah. It seemed that virtually the entire congregation would stand and then go to him in honour.

While honour was something that Oziel lived by, and while it was always given to him, he never looked for it. In his constant and genuine humility, he exemplified the best of character traits of one whose life was seeped in the religious concerns of the community. His great humility was coupled with his unconditional pursuit of peace. The reality is that shalom is unfortunately sometimes just an ideal. But for Oziel, peace, harmony, acceptance, tolerance and patience were simply part of who and what he was. Involved as he was in the community, he never waded into the dirtying waters of politics.

His past was that of the sacred: music, liturgy and ritual. Coming from a family of accomplished paytanim (religious singers), Oziel was predeceased by his brother Isaac in Morocco and here in Canada by his brother Mose some 18 years ago. Stored in his musical mind were many centuries of old tunes from Andalusia. He was a teacher of bar mitzvah boys, a service for which he never accepted payment. He played both the violin and the piano, the masters of all the instruments. He was also a gifted painter, and in Morocco, he was choirmaster of the Shir Hashirim choir, a group that preformed for free, bringing much cheer and meaning to many occasions.

Everything Oziel did, he did with joy, always offering pleasantries and compliments to all. He never saw evil or bad in anyone or anything.

Oziel was preoccupied with the accurate transmission of his very dear heritage. As such, years ago, when he saw synagogue youth struggle to find their place in the siddur, he produced his own prayer book that would present the service in a straightforward fashion. In this way, he would facilitate the involvement of an entire new generation in prayers. Today, these siddurim for weekdays, Shabbat and holidays can be found in homes and synagogues around the world.

All this is not to say that Oziel was primarily a man for the community. He was also the most loving and devoted husband and father. He is survived by his wife Esther Oziel and their nine children and blessed with many great-grandchildren. The void he left is felt by many. Yehi zichro baruch.

Rosh Hashanah foods

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

The Passover seder has matzah and maror. Chanukah nights are celebrated with latkes and soufganiyot. But what about Rosh Hashanah? While ushering in the Jewish New Year, we grace our table with apples, honey and some of the sweetest dishes of the Jewish year. Today, food and the High Holy Days.

Actually, Passover isn't the only holiday with a seder. One of the most interesting food-related customs of the upcoming holiday is the Yehi Ratzon or "May it be the will" Rosh Hashanah seder. On the first night of the holiday, a series of foods is eaten whose Hebrew names have dual significance. [http://www.diaspora.org.il/holidays/newyear-sed.htm] For example, the Hebrew word for black-eyed peas, "rubyah," sounds like the Hebrew word for increase, "yirbu." The peas are eaten and the following prayer is recited: "May it be the will of our heavenly Father that our merits increase."

Other foods in the Rosh Hashanah seder include carrots, fenugreek, beets, dates and gourds. We eat pomegranates so that "our merits increase like [the seeds of] a pomegranate," apples and honey so "that You renew us for a good and sweet year," and the head of a fish or sheep so "that we be as the head and not as the tail." [http://www.mishpacha.com/roshhashana.shtml]

Looking for something to eat with your sheep's head? There are plenty of Web sites bursting with New Year's suggestions. Try a Turkish Rosh Hashanah menu with Pan de Calabraza (Pumpkin Bread) and Keftes de Prasa (Leek Croquettes). [http://www.ritualwell.org/Rituals/ritual.html?docid=550] Mimi's Cyber Kitchen will tempt you with Beef Brisket with Onion Lemon Marmalade and a sinful (perhaps I should not use that word in a Rosh Hashanah article) Chocolate Babka. [http://www.cyber-kit chen.com/holidays/highholidays/recipes.htm]

But the bubbie of all lists belongs to the rec.food.cuisine.jewish archives where you will find almost 200 Rosh Hashanah recipes. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?I29A12885] There are five challah recipes, 19 tzimmes varieties and an even larger assortment of honey cakes. If you're still hungry, check out the Jewish-food High Holidays Archives. [http://www.jewish-food.org/recipes/hhoindex.htm]

If you prefer to enjoy your holiday meals without meat, you may want to pick up the Jewish Vegetarian Year Cookbook by Roberta Kalechofsky and Rosa Rasiel. You can read a review of the cookbook online and sample two of their offerings: Mock Chopped Liver and Van Gogh's Potatoes. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?D40C253D5]

Speaking of vegetarianism, Richard Schwartz suggests that Rosh Hashanah is the ideal time to switch to a meatless diet. Here is the first of the nine reasons he presents: "While Jews ask God on Rosh Hashanah for a healthy year, non-vegetarian diets have been linked to heart disease, strokes, several forms of cancer, and other illnesses." [http://schwartz.enviroweb.org/rosh_and_veg.html]

This year, on the second afternoon of Rosh Hashanah, Jews will go to a nearby stream or body of water to perform the ritual of Tashlich. [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/rosh/tashlich.htm] Prayers are recited and sins are symbolically tossed into the depths. Some people even shake out the hems of their clothing while others toss breadcrumbs into the waters. With that in mind, here's a tongue-in-cheek look at the custom.

"Taking a few crumbs on Rosh Hashanah to throw into the water for the Tashlich ceremony from whatever old bread is in the house lacks subtlety, nuance and religious sensitivity. Instead, this coming Rosh Hashanah consider these options: [http://www.kolel.org/pages/holidays/RoshHashanah_tashlich.html]

- For ordinary sins, use white bread
- For sins committed in haste, matzah
- For immodest dressing, tarts
- For causing injury or damage to others, tortes
- For committing car theft, caraway
- For substance abuse, stoned wheat
- For being holier than thou, bagels
- For sins of pride, puff pastry
- For unfairly upbraiding another, challah
- And for wearing tasteless hats, Tam Tams."

Warning: Since I first mentioned this site a few years ago, the list has lengthened and the puns have worsened! [http://www.davka.org/what/text/sermonics/tashlich.html]

- For gluttony, pound cake
- For flaunting wealth in the form of fancy cars, Rolls
- And for rabbis whose sermons are too long, shortnin' bread.

Enjoy your soul food and have a very happy and healthy year.

Women raise funds for breast cancer research

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Eighteen-year-old Alanna Petroff is one of the youngest participants in the upcoming Weekend to End Breast Cancer, a three-day event with a 60-km walk spread over this Saturday and Sunday. Petroff was also one of the first of more than 3,500 walkers to inquire about registering last winter.

The event will benefit the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation. Funds raised will be used for breast cancer research, patient care and educational programs at Princess Margaret Hospital, the largest institution in Canada exclusively devoted to cancer care.

The weekend is the first event of its kind in Canada, Neville Kirchmann, president and CEO of the foundation, said in a news release. "Millions of dollars has been raised for breast cancer research through similar events in dozens of cities across the United States."

[Frances Kraft photos]

Petroff, a Thornhill resident who recently started Carleton University's journalism program, was so moved last winter by a radio commercial for the fundraiser that she began to cry, she recalls. The ad ends, "I lost my sister to breast cancer, and I don't want to lose anyone else."

Petroff's father Ian died of a rare form of cancer in 1998, and her grandmother is a long-term breast cancer survivor.

As of last week, Petroff had raised $6,061.60 – more than three times the minimum $2,000 requested of each participant. Originally she thought $2,000 was ambitious, but event coaches encouraged her to set an even higher goal.

Of her total, $50.60 was collected at a reception to honour a group of scholarship applicants, including Petroff. The scholarship committee knew of her fundraising and put out a collection basket on her behalf, she said.

In addition to soliciting individual and corporate donations, Petroff, an artist who worked on commissions over the summer, organized a fundraiser tea and silent auction.

Paula Seigel, who was diagnosed with breast cancer last November, is also a determined walker. Although she had never been involved in fundraising, the 32-year-old Grade 1 teacher and mother of two (4-year-old Jayden and one-year-old Dylan), is one of the event's top five individual fundraisers, according to the event web site, www.endcancer.ca.

Seigel has raised almost $30,000 single-handedly. Her team of three dozen family, friends and supporters – Paula's Possee – has raised a combined total of more than $110,000.

Seigel and her husband, Geoff, who is also taking part in the walk, originally attended an orientation meeting because Paula's cousin was on the organizing committee. Others at the meeting were moved to tears when Geoff Seigel stood up and said he was there for his wife, who had been looking to get involved in a support group or event.

Despite undergoing chemotherapy at Princess Margaret Hospital from January to June, Seigel was determined to be involved. She has appeared on television and was interviewed for Toronto Fashion, a glossy magazine in which she was featured in June.

Accompanying the article was a striking photograph of Seigel, with dazzling smile, professionally applied make-up and a completely bald head, having lost her hair to chemotherapy but looking for all the world like a fashion model.

Currently, the Seigels are involved in Rethink Breast Cancer, a charitable organization geared toward young adults in their 20s and 30s.

She said that women, particularly younger women, need to be "aware of their bodies" and to learn to examine their own breasts. Breast cancer is commonly thought of as an older women's disease, Seigel said, but since she was diagnosed she has met many women with breast cancer who are younger than she is.

One in nine Canadian women will be diagnosed with breast cancer, organizers say.

When Seigel discovered a lump in her breast, she was eight months pregnant. Although her doctor did not think it was cancer, and two ultrasounds showed nothing, Seigel was "very persistent.

"You really have to take charge of your health," she said.

Only after a needle biopsy did she learn that she had Stage I breast cancer. "My prognosis is very good."

Over the winter, Seigel did strength training and yoga, and took 5-km walks to prepare for the weekend event.

She fundraised by e-mailing and talking to people. Seigel's story, as told on her Web page (accessible from the event Web site) has prompted donations from people she hasn't seen in years as well as some she doesn't even know, including donors from overseas, she said.

Seigel writes that she was lucky to catch her disease early, and to live in a city with a facility such as Princess Margaret Hospital.

"Who knows…," she adds, for potential donors who read the page. "[T]his donation could be the very donation that provides clues for a cure!"

Winchevsky school marks 75 years of Yiddishkeit

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

On Sept. 21, the Morris Winchevsky School will mark its 75th anniversary with a day-long celebration of Yiddishkeit culminating in a gala concert and reception.

It's a fitting theme for a school that has been devoted to the study of Yiddish language and culture since its inception in 1928, says Maxine Hermolin, executive director of the Morris Winchevsky School and the United Jewish People's Order (UJPO).

"The school was founded by Eastern European immigrants who had a love and passion for Yiddishkeit and weltlechkeit [worldliness]. That continues to be the foundation of the Morris Winchevsky School.

"We continue to teach Yiddish culture, Jewish history, holiday traditions along with social justice issues that are relevant in contemporary society."

A reunion of alumnae at 10 a.m. at the Morris Winchevsky Centre (585 Cranbrooke Ave.) will kick off the day of festivities, which will include workshops, refreshments and a sing-along. The keynote address will be delivered at 11 a.m by Ester Reiter, a professor of sociology and women's studies at Atkinson College at York University. She will speak on the history of Yiddish schools in North America.

The highlight of the day is KLEZ- MORE!, a gala concert of Jewish music followed by a reception. KLEZ- MORE! takes place at 7:30 p.m. at the Isabel Bader Theatre (93 Charles St.)

The featured performers are Yiddish soloist Dave Wall and pianist Marilyn Lerner, both of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band; the Klezmer Swingtet, which performs a fusion of swing and klezmer music; and singer/songwriter Batsheva. Children's entertainer Sharon Hampson, formerly of Sharon, Lois and Bram and an alumna of the Winchevsky school, will be the evening's MC.

"We're hoping that the broad range of the concert's musical repertoire will attract alumnae and the broader Jewish community," says Hermolin.

Video interviews of Winchevsky alumnae spanning several generations will be interspersed with the music.

"It will be an opportunity for people to have a glimpse of the school throughout the decades," she says, noting that her own family has been involved with Winchevsky and UJPO for four generations.

"My grandmother, Eva Swartz, arrived in Toronto a widow with three young children. When she discovered [UJPO], she found a school and camp for her children and a community for herself.

"She passed on her passion for the organization to my mother [Lee Schechter]. She shared it with my father and her children. All my children have been through the school. They've taught in the school. They've contributed to the organization. It's a passion we all share."

Winchevsky class from the 1940s.

She says the school's founders were visionaries who created a community for themselves and their children. "They were social activists with a vision for a better world."

A cornerstone of this vision was the establishment of the Winchevsky School, where social justice, civil rights and other progressive ideas, as well as Yiddish language and culture, could be passed on to the next generation, Hermolin says.

In the early years, the students attended four afternoons a week and were immersed in an intensive Yiddish language program. For the last 30 years, the school has run on Sundays only.

Other events for the anniversary celebration at the Winchevsky Centre venue include a singalong at noon, and a workshop called "B'nai Mitzvah: the Secular Way," which will be led by Leslie and Shane Dyson of the Vancouver Peretz Centre. The daytime events are free.

Concert/ reception tickets start at $25 for students and seniors and $35 for adults. To purchase tickets or for more information about 75th anniversary events, call 416-789-5502.

Eggleton among Liberals opposing Al-Jazeera

- an e-mail read on the Al-Jazeera program The Opposite Direction that "[Jews are] the descendants of apes and pigs [who] will not be deterred unless there is a true Holocaust that will exterminate all of them at once."

Toronto-area MP Art Eggleton said Al-Jazeera's presence in Canada "would be a detriment to Canadian society. The hatred spoken over the airwaves by Al-Jazeera could well contravene Canada's hate laws."

Eggleton said that in recent years Canada has experienced a rise in anti-Semitism tied to events in the Middle East. Adding Al-Jazeera to the roster of cable offerings would add to the incitement against Jews, he said.

Montreal-area MP Jacques Saada said that "Al-Jazeera is a station which has a history of allowing the distribution of materials that are contrary to our Canadian laws and Charter. I don't think Canada has anything to gain by being exposed to hate propaganda. Allowing it would go against the grain of who we are as Canadians."

Coincidentally, one of Al-Jazeera's star reporters, Tayssir Alluni, was charged in Spain last week with having links with Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda terror network.

Israel and the Middle East: On the Road to Where?

Three years after the eruption of a campaign of violence against Israel, the Middle East remains in seemingly perpetual conflict. The current Road Map has few passionate supporters, yet might one day provide a path toward hope. And so, this fall, with the help of four exceptional minds, we will reflect on the current moment.

New CJC staffer sets sights on small Ont. communities

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Thumbtacks dot the map of Ontario hanging behind the desk of Arieh Rosenblum, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region's new director of community development.

The thumbtacks mark the location of each of his charges – the 27 unfederated Jewish communities across the province.

Rosenblum, 34, who replaces Michael Soberman, is responsible for a group of staff who develop programs for all Ontario Jewish communities, except Windsor, London, Hamilton, Toronto and Ottawa. "There is no other province where the Jewish community is so diffuse," he says.

"My position is unique in that it is split between CJC and United Israel Appeal. I am involved with providing educational programming, as well as fundraising."

Most of the unfederated communities have old and strong Jewish roots and a tremendous amount of history and experience, says Rosenblum. "While that is a strength, it also presents a challenge because the communities are aging.

"We offer a connection to the broader Jewish community by providing a wealth of educational resources, and showing them that we have a genuine interest in their continuity."

'We provide a wealth of educational resources'

Jews in smaller communities have consistently maintained their interest in Jewish causes and have an appreciation of our values, culture and religion, says Rosenblum.

"They show a value of family and community that perhaps is not so readily observed in larger communities. They take nothing for granted. People in large cities should learn from that."

He says he plans to spend much of his time travelling across the province, "because it is of critical importance to establish personal relationships. Something is missing unless we meet on a personal level."

CJC and UIA is sensitive to the fact many of these communities are dwindling because teens go off to university and often don't come back, Rosenblum says. "This is not the case of every community, but we have to be responsible for those that need us."

Jewish leaders in small communities often have connection with local political leaders, he says, and they can use this relationship to promote the interests of Israel and the Jewish people. "This voice is something that cannot be discounted."

Among the programs offered by his staff are a Holocaust teacher training session, adult education series on various topics, a number of programs about Israel, and Shabbat dinners and Jewish music evenings.

CJC also runs a program for youth that culminates in a trip to Israel, and has an educational consultant to help Hebrew schools develop their curriculums.

"It's quite a challenge, and in the next number of months I expect to get everywhere I need to go. I'm looking forward to meeting some very interesting and active people."

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Students in photography program teach each other.

During the past year, as suicide bombings and military responses increased the divide between Palestinians and Israelis, a group of 20 teenagers went into each other's homes armed with cameras and a desire to overcome their apprehensions about each other.

The Israeli Jewish and Arab students were enrolled in a photography class at the Givat Haviva Educational Centre, where they learned about more than aperture, lighting and how to develop black and white photos. After three months of classroom work, they were sent on a field trip to snap photos of whatever they chose. The only requirement: Jewish students had to take their cameras into Arab homes and Arab students had to take their cameras into Jewish homes.

The pictures, which will be on display at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre until Sept. 22, capture elements of commonality, moments of discovery and simple acts of sharing. Cultural differences pepper the exhibit with honest tensions.

"For many of the kids, it was the first time they ever went inside a home of the other," said Etti Amran, the director of the program at the centre, which was founded in 1949 by the Kibbutz Artzi Movement.

Today, formal and informal educational programs are offered for adults and children in a broad range of professional and academic fields. Their catalogue says their classes encourage dialogue and understanding between Jews and Arabs by forcing them to confront stereotypes and learn to deal with those different from themselves.

When the students go into each other's rooms, they can't help but notice that "more is the same than is different," Amran said. They see familiar posters on the walls, hear recognizable music and step over the usual mess of clothes on the floor.

At the beginning of each photography program, the school meets with the parents to explain the requirements. Interestingly, they always want to talk politics, but the kids tell them to stop, Amram said.

After the year is over, the teenagers tend to remain friends, Amram said, but noted that moderate students are more likely to enrol. Those with more radical points of view would never register for this kind of a class.

Israeli firms promote delicacies at Toronto Fine Foods Expo

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to the CJN

At one time, "Israeli food" meant falafel, or, in the grocery store, greasy fried snacks or Passover chocolate bars.

But now, as the Fine Foods from Israel Expo proved earlier this month, Israeli foods are sweet, sour, nutritious, crunchy, frozen, organic, fresh-baked, convenient – and delicious!

Thirty-one Israeli companies offered up their newest and best in an afternoon for 150 invitees at the Richmond Hill Country Club on Sept. 3. Aimed at buyers, distributors, caterers and other food-service personnel, the event's goal, said Israeli Trade Commissioner Benjamin Noy, was to offer them "the opportunity to talk… to make contacts, take cards."

But the exhibitors were handing out more than cards. Samples of tasty Israeli fare flew off the tables – sometimes piping hot.

Canadian distributors Yossi and David Hazan of King David Pizza showed off a "bake in the pack" tray that takes Israeli bourekas and rugelach straight from freezer to oven.

Effie Wiesel of Bagel Bites served up fresh food of a different kind. The U.S.-based importer for Jerusalem's 75-year-old Angel Bakeries said his cakes, cookies and rugelach "taste no different" from bakery-bought fare. "People tell me it tastes as good as they remember from Israel."

He said he is so pleased with his existing market in Montreal that he is now expanding eastward.

Wiesel has good reason to appreciate the Canadian market. According to Noy, we spent $20 million on Israeli food between January and August, a 30 per cent increase over the same period last year. Consumers are increasingly aware of Israeli products, and buyers from Sobey's, Kosher City and other stores browsed displays for exciting products to offer shoppers.

A true Israeli success story, Zoglo's Meatless Cuisine displayed new fresh and frozen foods, including ready-to-bake Yemenite desserts.

Zoglo's has expanded far beyond the traditional Jewish market with high-quality soy and tofu items bearing kosher, halal, non-GMO (genetically modified organisms) and FDA Heart Smart certification.

Checking out the variety of Israeli foods at the fine food expo. [Stephen Epstein / Big Dipper Communications]

Local importer Yael Ender said buying Israeli products supports the state's economy in a way donations alone can't. And there's no reason not to buy, she said. "The products are excellent."

Another frozen convenience food in the spotlight was Dorot brand garlic cubes. Kibbutz-grown and preservative-free, they help home chefs by cutting preparation time and eliminating waste.

Noy said he was pleased with the event's turnout and "ambience."

The Toronto initiative was backed by the finefoodsisrael.com Web site, which links North Americans with quality Israeli brands.

Consumers often simply don't know the products exist, Noy said, so they choose Italian or Spanish olive oil when "before Rome was built, olive oil techniques were passed down in Israel for thousands of years."

But even with traditional foods such as olive oil, Israelis are innovating, as with a new process that solidifies olive oil into a spread form, without the hydrogenation process used in many margarines.

"You can eat it on sliced bread in the morning… it has a lovely flavour," said Yael Shahin of Montreal's IVAM Group, which distributes the spread. IVAM also imports carob, date and nut spreads.

There were even a few surprises from Elite Industries, one of the most familiar Israeli brands. Yaakov Baron, a broker for Elite, said that while Canadians associate Elite products with Passover, we will soon see coffee, candy, baked goods and snack items year-round.

Baron also represents Taamiko Foods, instant baby foods that he believes can compete with domestic brands. First, he said, "they have a very strong kashrut [certification]," with a "Badatz" hechsher. As well, many expatriate Israelis miss these familiar products, and"the pricing is very competitive."

Of course, no food event before Rosh Hashanah would be complete without honey, and Israel's largest apiary, Yad Mordechai (in which Elite recently acquired a 51 per cent share), was on hand to sweeten the event.

Yad Mordechai products are imported exclusively by David Kaplan of Israel's Judaica through his Israel Candy Company.

Noy also praised Israeli wines, a major import for the holidays, saying "they're among the finest in the world."

Janet Klugsberg of Mazel Wines said, "Kosher wine doesn't have to be sweet. Israeli wines rival any around." For the upcoming holidays, she recommended Gamla Cabernet Sauvignon 2000, which "has wonderful black currant, jammy flavours… for soft and easy drinking."

Carol Slatt of Lorac Wine, which imports Carmel wines, said the Carmel Muscat dessert wine is "beautiful for the sukkah." She also suggested sparkling wines, such as Carmel's Cuvée Brut Reserve.

Slatt's company is vocal about supporting Israel. "Yes, we all give, buy bonds," she said. "But when you buy [products], you support Israel directly, which is the highest mitzvah."

Beth Tikvah welcomes Cantor Kovari to shul

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The bookshelves in Cantor Tibor Kovari's office at Beth Tikvah Synagogue were still virtually empty during a late August interview, but on his desk were four neatly stacked, hefty black binders filled with the synagogue's music.

"This is a synagogue with a great tradition in music. It's known for being a singing congregation," said Kovari, 30, who moved here recently from Halifax, where he spent three years as cantor, baal koreh, teacher and youth leader at Beth Israel Synagogue.

Cantor Tibor Kovari

Among his initial goals in Toronto is to master Beth Tikvah's extensive repertoire. He has already begun rehearsing with the synagogue choir, which is directed by Eyal Bitton.

An afficionado of traditional chassidic music, Kovari, a baritone, said he likes "every single aspect of Jewish music." He also likes congregational singing, he said, and he hopes that when people leave one of his services that they will not only be moved, but will feel that "they personally – not the cantor – had a wonderful davening experience.

"I want everybody in the congregation to feel that had a part in the service."

Three years ago, Kovari, a native of Romania, moved to Canada with his wife Isabela, now a recent computer science graduate of Dalhousie University. She also worked as an Israeli dance specialist at Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia.

Born in Cluj, Kovari moved with his parents at age 6 to Oradea, which at that time probably had about 1,500 Jews, he said. Today, its Jewish community numbers around 550.

Living under Communist rule until 1989, Jews in Romania were able to practise their religion, but discreetly, said Kovari. He attended twice-weekly Talmud Torah and sang in a Jewish youth choir called Hakeshet Oradea (the Oradea Rainbow), where he learned hundreds of Jewish songs.

That experience had a significant impact on him, he said, as did a local performance he attended at age 14, by visiting chazzanim including Cantor David Bagley, who has since retired and Cantor Yaakov Motzen, now cantor at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. "That was my first experience with cantorial music," Kovari said.

Also, his two grandfathers, both Holocaust survivors, had excellent voices and taught him Hungarian operetta arias, he recalled. His maternal grandfather, Endre Schwartz, edited Uj Kelet (New Sunrise), the Cluj-based Hungarian-language Jewish newspaper that moved to Israel during Romania's Communist years.

Kovari decided after graduating from high school that he wanted to learn more about Judaism, and moved to Hungary to study for four years at the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary in Budapest, along with other students from former Communist countries.

His mother and late father, both physicians, were very supportive, he said.

Kovari continued his Judaic studies at Ohr Somayach Tanenbaum Educational Center in Monsey, N.Y., from 1996 to 1997, then returned to Romania to work for the Jewish community and pursue cantorial studies at Romania's Federation of Jewish Communities in Bucharest for three years. While there, he served as cantor and director of Jewish education for the Romanian Jewish community; and as acting rabbi, Jewish studies and Hebrew language teacher for Bucharest's Lauder-REUT Jewish School and Kindergarten.

He also met his wife at that time, when she was working as national secretary of the Tnuat Aliyah movement in Romania.

They married in 2000 in Bucharest and immigrated to Canada with the hope of living and eventually raising children in a more Jewish environment.

In Halifax, they opened their apartment to about 40 students for weekly Shabbat dinners. "I really enjoy working with youth and students," said Kovari, who will be involved in developing a new bar/bat mitzvah program at Beth Tikvah.

While it's still early to say, he may even organize a synagogue basketball league. The 6'5" cantor played on a national silver medal-winning team while in school.

Here is a sample of this year's COR Rosh Hashanah recipes.

HUNGARIAN GOULASH

SOUP or STEW

Authentic Hungarian paprika provides the colour and flavour in this soup. It can be served as a thin or thick soup or as a stew.

3 tbsp. olive or vegetable oil
2 large tomatoes, peeled and chopped
2 large onions, thinly sliced
8 cups water, approximately
2-4 garlic cloves, minced
2 medium potatoes, peeled and cubed
1 tsp. caraway seeds
2 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. Hungarian paprika
½ tsp. pepper
2 lbs. stewing beef or veal (cubed)

Heat the oil and gently stir in the onion, garlic, caraway and paprika; cook until tender. Add the meat and stir until well browned. Add the tomato and enough water to cover all the ingredients, adding more if necessary to prevent over-browning. Cook for 30 minutes. Add the potatoes and more water to reach desired consistency. Cover and simmer until meat and potatoes are well cooked, about 30 minutes. Taste and season with salt and pepper.

Garnish with green pepper rings and fresh tomato wedges. If the consistency is very thick, you may want to serve it with a fork and mop up the juices with bread. Serves 8.

LEMONY VEAL CUTLETS

6 thin veal cutlets
dash black pepper
2 eggs, beaten
6 tbsp. lemon juice
3 tbsp. flour
3 tbsp. capers
1½ cups dry bread crumbs
3 tbsp. chopped green onions
3 tsp. olive oil
3 tsp. margarine

Dip each veal cutlet into beaten egg. Set aside. Combine the flour and bread crumbs on a plate and coat each veal cutlet in the mixture. Set aside.

Heat the oil and margarine in a large skillet over medium heat for 20-30 seconds. Add the breaded cutlets and cook for 2 minutes on one side. If they overlap, cook in two batches. Turn and sprinkle with black pepper. Add the lemon juice, capers and green onions. Cook an additional 2 minutes. Remove from skillet and serve.

Variation: Preheat oven to 350. Heat the oil and margarine. Place the cutlets in a roasting pan and bake for 5-6 minutes, turning if necessary. Serves 6.

BULGUR AND CHICK PEA SALAD

1 cup bulgur
1 tbsp. dry wine water
1 tbsp. vinegar
1 can chick peas, drained and rinsed
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 lb cherry tomatoes, quartered
salt and pepper to taste
1 cup chopped flat leaf parsley
6 green onions, thinly sliced

Garnishes:
lettuce, olives, cubed cucumber and lemon wedges
4 tsp. pine nuts, toasted (optional)

Place the bulgur in a bowl and cover with cold water. Let soak for 30 minutes. Drain in a fine sieve, shaking to remove excess water. Return to bowl. Add chick peas, tomatoes, parsley and green onions. Mix well. Add the wine, vinegar, olive oil, salt and pepper. Mix well to combine. Heap the mixture onto a plate on a bed of lettuce. Garnish with olives, cucumber and lemon wedges. Sprinkle with toasted pine nuts. Serves 6.

Variation: Use couscous in place of the bulgur, using the same method as for the bulgur. For dairy, add ¼ cup crumbled feta cheese.

ROASTED PEPPER MEDLEY

6 tbsp. olive oil
4 large red bell peppers, roasted, cut into strips*
⅓ cup pine nuts
4 large yellow bell peppers, roasted, cut into strips*
3 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
⅓ cup golden raisins
1 medium garlic clove, minced
salt and black pepper to taste

In a small skillet, heat 1 tbsp. of the olive oil over medium heat. Add the pine nuts and stir constantly until lightly browned. Immediately remove from heat, transfer to a small bowl and set aside.

In a jar, combine vinegar, garlic and remaining oil. Shake well until emulsified. Can also be processed in a food processor.

Add peppers, pine nuts and raisins. Toss gently and season with salt and pepper. Serve at room temperature.

*To roast peppers, broil until they are charred and blistered. Place in a paper bag for a few minutes to cool. Place the peppers in a bowl, pull off the skin and remove the stems, membranes and seeds. Strain and use the juices in a soup. Serves 6.

Note: Add green and orange bell peppers for a colourful salad.

Holiday Food Ideas

Cooking with 'pan-pals'

BY NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

I spend countless hours each day at my computer, reading recipes and searching for ideas for my cookbooks and food articles, inspired by foodie-friends from all over the world. Although many of us have never met, we are connected through a culinary umbilical cord. In culinary cyberspace, we are called "pan-pals," not pen-pals! We share our recipes, experiences, inspirations and food memories, travelling through time zones with just a quick click of the mouse.

These are some of the recipes shared with me by friends from near and far. I hope you enjoy these delicious dishes for the upcoming High Holy Days… or any time of year.

My friend Beverley Gordon of Toronto loves to cook. She comes most Wednesday afternoons to help me test recipes, often shlepping bagfuls of ingredients for our culinary adventures. I test a few recipes, Bev marks down my notes, then they are entered into the computer.She kindly shared this family favourite with me, which she got from a cousin years ago.

Beverley says: "I associate September with Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and new beginnings. Rosh Hashanah dinner would not be the same if I forgot to make this wonderful side dish. It is a sweet blend of root vegetables, plentiful at this time of the year. It can be made a day in advance and reheats well."

BEV GORDON'S
CARROT AND SWEET POTATO TZIMMES

3 sweet potatoes, peeled
1 squash, peeled and seeded
4 large carrots, peeled
24 pitted prunes, halved
1 cup orange juice
1 tsp. grated orange rind
1/4 cup brown sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon (optional)
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 375. Cut sweet potatoes and squash into a 1-inch dice. Slice carrots into 1/2-inch slices. Combine vegetables with prunes, orange juice, orange rind, brown sugar, cinnamon, salt and pepper in a 9x13-inch greased baking dish. Cover with foil and bake for 40 minutes. Uncover and bake 20 minutes longer, stirring occasionally. Yield: 8 servings.

Jamie Stolper is the co-founder and food editor of www.ShalomBoston.com and we've become "pan-pals" over the miles. She was good enough to share this yummy chicken recipe with me that is part of the excellent recipe collection on their Web site. It is a variation of a recipe she found on the Aish HaTorah Web site, a favourite of the ShalomBoston.com staff. This recipe is now one of her family's favourites as well.

The name and the taste are perfect for Rosh Hashanah, but you can enjoy this year round. You might think it is a very sweet dish, but the soy sauce and spices tone down the sweetness. The end result is a tasty and different chicken dish that you will be proud to serve.

JAMIE STOLPER'S CHICKEN
WITH APPLES AND HONEY

2 cut-up chickens (approximately 3 lbs. each)
2 tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. nutmeg
1/2 tsp. pepper
5 oz. dried apple rings, chopped or cut into small pieces
2 golden delicious apples, chopped
1 cup honey
1/2 cup apple juice
1/2 cup soy sauce

Preheat oven to 350. Place chicken pieces in baking pan skin side up. Mix together the cinnamon, nutmeg and pepper, and sprinkle over the chicken. (Use a small fine sieve for even sprinkling.) Throw the dry and fresh apples on top of the chicken. Combine the honey, apple juice and soy sauce and pour over the chicken. Make sure to soak all the dry apples, as they will burn otherwise.

Bake for 1 to 1 1/2 hours. If the chicken needs more browning, remove the pieces to another pan and broil for a few minutes, watching carefully. Scrape the sauce from the first pan into a bowl to serve as "extra" or pour over the chicken when done cooking. (The sauce will burn if it cooks too much or at too high a temperature.) Serve hot or at room temperature. Makes 8 servings.

Ruth Saddick and I forged our culinary connection when she wrote me all the way from Australia. She was asked to give a cooking demonstration at a bridal shower and made my challah recipe from The Food Processor Bible. Her demonstration was such a success that many of the guests told her they were going to buy my book! Ruth writes a cooking column for the Macabbean called The Recipe Scribbler. She comes from Singapore and has a passion for dishes that are exotic and elegant, yet simple to prepare. She asked me to share some entertaining tips and a recipe with her readers in Australia, which I gladly did. In return, she shared this special rice dish with me for my Canadian readers.

Ruth writes: "This rice dish symbolizes the hope and sweetness we pray for on Rosh Hashanah eve. Please make sure that the saffron you use is genuine. It is the world's most expensive spice, but for Rosh Hashanah, only the best will do! Make sure you purchase true saffron, avoiding turmeric as a substitute. Turmeric will give you colour, but not the exquisite flavour and colour of saffron."

RUTH SADDICK'S
SWEET AND FRAGRANT SPICY SAFFRON PILAU

2½ cups Indian basmati rice
¼ tsp. saffron threads (or 1/8 tsp. saffron powder)
1 tbsp. hot water
2 tbsp. light olive oil
1 onion, finely sliced
1 small stick cinnamon
5 cardamon pods, bruised
5 cloves
5 cups hot stock or water
2 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. sultana raisins
¼ cup toasted slivered almonds
¼ cup green peas (optional)

Wash the rice, then drain it in a colander and leave to rest for about 30 minutes. If using saffron threads, toast them for a minute in a dry frying pan, taking care not to burn or darken them. Turn them out onto a saucer and leave for a minute or two to become cool and crisp; then crush to a powder with the back of a spoon. Dissolve the powder in the tablespoon of hot water.

Heat the oil in a heavy-based saucepan and fry the onion and spices until the onion is golden. Add the rice and fry for about 5 minutes, stirring with a metal spoon. Add the hot stock or water, salt, saffron and sultana raisins to the pan, then stir well and bring to the boil. Cover the pan tightly, then reduce the heat to the lowest setting and cook for 20 minutes without disturbing. Turn off the heat and leave undisturbed for 10 minutes.

Before serving, uncover the pan and allow the steam to escape for a minute before fluffing gently with a fork and removing the whole spices. Turn out onto a large serving platter. Garnish with almonds and peas. (Ruth also makes a red chili

This delicious apple cake from my cookbook The Food Processor Bible (Whitecap Books, $29.95) is packed with apples and is held together with minimum cake batter. It makes a healthy dessert choice that will surely "ap-peel" to your holiday guests. Splenda can be substituted for the sugar for those who are carbohydrate-challenged. NORENE GILLETZ'S APPLE LOVER'S CAKE

14 to 16 apples, peeled, quartered and cored
1/3 to 1/2 cup sugar (or to taste)
2 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/2 cup additional sugar
1/2 cup canola oil
1/2 cup unsweetened applesauce
1 tsp. vanilla extract (or 1 tbsp. brandy)
2 eggs (or 1 egg plus 2 egg whites)
1 cup flour (half whole wheat flour can be used)
1 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt

Preheat oven to 350. Slicer: Slice apples, using medium pressure. Place in sprayed 9x13-inch glass baking dish, filling it nearly to the top. (Apples will shrink during baking.) Sprinkle with 1/3 to 1/2 cup sugar and cinnamon and mix well; spread evenly in pan.

Steel Blade: Process remaining 1/2 cup sugar, oil, applesauce, vanilla extract and eggs for 1 minute, until well blended. Add flour, baking powder and salt; process with 3 or 4 quick on/offs, until blended. Pour batter evenly over apples. Bake about 1 hour, or until golden. Yield: 12 to 15 servings.

This cake gets soggy if frozen. It's unlikely there will be leftovers!

Note: For a small family, make half the recipe in a 7x11-inch baking dish and bake 45 to 50 minutes.

Brisket is good for the soul

By LISA J. SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

Exploring the stack of old Jewish cookbooks and family recipes my mother brought me when she visited from Atlanta, I found a note. On the top of a small white paper, in her handwriting, were the words Rosh Hashanah, and then the list: Apple Charlie, challah, kugel, green bean salad, brisket.

I asked her if this meal plan was from last year, but she said no.

"That must have been from many, many years ago," she said, standing in my California kitchen with the afternoon sun lighting half her face. That must have been why, when I read it, I tasted decades of family holiday meals and decided we should buy a brisket and make it together.

She chose a nice four-pound cut, and since the ingredients for my mother's brisket are basic staples, salt, pepper, olive oil, garlic, onions and good wine, we lost no time shopping around.

But since it cooks entirely on top of the stove, gently, over hours, it gave us lots of time to watch over a deep, bubbling, burgundy sauce, while absorbing the rich scents filling my tiny kitchen, taking us back all those years.

And when, after the roast had cooled overnight, my mother showed me how to slice it, carefully against the grain, and reheat it, layering the tender meat back in the gravy, framing it with softened orange carrots, I took a picture of our creation, right in the pot. Because it was beautiful.

When I looked up different brisket recipes, I found all kinds of creative approaches – one cooking the meat in molasses sweetened navy beans, and one adding a blanket of cooked prunes. But all of them had a key element in common. Time. Each requires at least an overnight of marinade and anywhere from three to six hours of low heat cooking to soften and season the meat. For my Mom's brisket, the techniques are straightforward, the ingredients few, but if the definition of soul food is cooking simple foods, very slowly, then a Rosh Hashanah brisket must be good for the soul.

KAETHE'S STOVETOP BRISKET

The seasonings and gravy for this recipe are light enough to gracefully enhance the flavour of the meat. But if you like more spice, add salt and pepper to suit your tastes and enjoy!

4-lb. beef brisket
$1\frac{1}{4}$ tsp. salt (to taste)
$\frac{1}{4}$ tsp. pepper (to taste)
4 large garlic cloves, sliced thin
1 large onion, sliced thin
3 tbsp. olive oil
1 cup dry red wine
2 tbsp. olive oil
$\frac{1}{2}$ tsp. paprika
3 large carrots

Marinade: Rinse brisket in cold water and place in large dish with sides. Thinly slice garlic cloves and onion and arrange under and over meat. In small bowl, whisk salt, pepper, 3 tbsp. olive oil, and wine. Pour over meat. Cover and refrigerate overnight, turning meat once.

Cooking: Heat 2 tbsp. of oil in heavy, deep, wide skillet over medium heat. After scraping off but saving onions and garlic, place brisket in pan, searing each side until slightly brown, about 4-5 minutes. Place meat aside on platter. Pour marinade into pan, and bring to a boil over high heat. Reduce heat to low, return meat to pan, scatter onions and garlic above and below, and spoon liquid over top of brisket. Sprinkle top with $\frac{1}{4}$ tsp. of paprika.

Cover and reduce heat to low, simmering approximately 3 hours, turning after $1\frac{1}{2}$ hours and sprinkling other side with $\frac{1}{4}$ tsp. of paprika. Add whole carrots during last hour. Test with knife. Meat should be soft but firm enough not to shred.

Turn off heat. Let cool slightly, then remove from marinade.

Cooling: Place meat in large dish, cover and refrigerate overnight for ease of slicing. Strain gravy to separate onion, garlic slices, and whole carrots from liquid. Then store each in refrigerator overnight.

Slicing/Serving: Skim fat off top layer of marinade and pour into deep, wide skillet. Mash onions and garlic with spoon and add to marinade. Heat on medium-low. Test for salt or pepper preferences. Slice brisket in $\frac{1}{4}$-in. wide slices against the grain and layer into marinade with carrots. Cover and re-warm approximately 30 minutes or just until gravy starts to bubble. Do not over- cook. Serve brisket slices on platter with some gravy spooned over and remainder on the side. Serves: 10.

BY JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

For Rosh Hashanah dinner Levana Kirschenbaum knows she will have a full house, but just who's coming to dinner is anyone's guess.

"I never invite people. They call me. I take all the calls and let everybody come until the table is full and the kitchen is closed. I'm cooking, and anybody who needs a place, please come."

If you're not planning a trip to New York, however, you can duplicate Kirschenbaum's menu at your house with her new cookbook, Levana's Table: Kosher Cooking for Everyone (Stewart, Tabori & Chang), 150 exciting, gourmet, kosher recipes, beautifully photographed, clearly explained and just begging to be tried.

Born in Morocco, Kirschenbaum studied in France and came to the United States at the age of 24. For more than 20 years, her bakery, restaurant, catering business and cooking classes have attracted a loyal following, and no wonder. Her recipes reflect the exotic cuisine of her homeland and the international influence of her travels: Lamb and Eggplant Curry, Chicken Paella, Moroccan Pastillas. Even the old favourites take on new dimension under Kirschenbaum's masterful direction: Cholent with wheat berries instead of beans, pareve noodle kugel bursting with applesauce and onion, hot Russian borscht with parsnips and turnips, tzimmes loaf.

Kirschenbaum is passionate about desserts and tackles the challenge of creating show-stopping endings to kosher meat dinners with what she calls her "mad-scientist experimenting." Her bakery's dairy-free sweets drew a non-kosher as well as a kosher clientele, and were sold at Macy's, Zabar's and many fine New York restaurants.

What does she think of non-dairy creamers and the like? Not much. Kirschenbaum is sold on soy! "You wouldn't believe what I can do with tofu and soy," she says. "Custards, crème brûlée, chocolate truffles." Even tiramisu gets the tofu treatment, and go ahead and try to top this one: Frozen Halvah-Pecan Terrine with Maple-Rum Sauce and Pecan Lace Cookies.

"Soy milk and soy products sales are soaring now," Kirschenbaum notes, "and you don't have to go to a specialty store to find them anymore. Every supermarket… carries these products." For the uninitiated, the book includes a primer on the use of soy.

Kirschenbaum credits her mother for passing along the skills, curiosity and dedication that make her shine in the kitchen. "I have the greatest respect for my mother," she says. "Lidia Bastianich (of PBS) always says that she works with very poor ingredients, because this is the training she had at home. Her family was grindingly poor, like we were, but the food was fabulous. There must be something to it, since they used ordinary ingredients and the result was so great. Maybe the talent was in your labour and how you put things together."

But Kirschenbaum's holiday menu is far from ordinary. "Almost everything we serve the first night of Rosh Hashanah is based on sweet ingredients: pumpkin soup, Chicken Tagine with Prunes," she said. "The whole night is centered around the same theme. Sephardim do a lot of things with sweet vegetables. Here, you have apples dipped in honey, but in Morocco, we sweetened what we call the 'seven vegetables' – leeks, carrots, butternut squash, turnips, onions, zucchini, garbanzo beans. Everything was sweet, everything fragrant. Pomegranates in orange flower water, lamb with fresh dates. Have you ever tasted a fresh date? Delicious! Like Thanksgiving here, it was all about celebrating the bounty, the abundance, the sweetness, the blessing of food."

While the book does offer a honey cake recipe, Kirschenbaum says this dessert was not traditional in Morocco. "We didn't have honey cake, but we did have honey-based pastries, like baklava," she recalled.

CHICKEN TAGINE WITH PRUNES AND ALMONDS

1½ tbsp. vegetable oil
1 medium onion, chopped
1 tbsp. sugar
2 lbs. chicken parts, dark and white meat, or all dark pinch of saffron
½ tsp. (scant) turmeric
1½ cinnamon sticks
½ tsp. freshly ground pepper
1 cup water
½ tbsp. ground cinnamon
½ lb. pitted prunes (about 1 cup packed)
2 tbsp. sesame seeds, toasted
3 tbsp. slivered almonds, toasted (optional on Rosh Hashanah)

Heat the oil in a heavy pot over medium heat. Add the onion and fry until it is dark brown, about 30 minutes. Add the sugar and cook for 1 more minute. Add the chicken, saffron, turmeric, cinnamon sticks, ground pepper and water and bring to a boil. Reduce the heat to medium-high and cook, covered, for 1 hour. Add the ground cinnamon and the prunes and cook for 15 more minutes.

Using slotted spoon, gently transfer the chicken and prunes to a platter, taking care not to bruise the prunes. The liquid left in the pot should be thick and creamy. If it is too thin, reduce it over high heat for a minute or two. Pour the sauce over the chicken. Just before serving, sprinkle on the sesame seeds and almonds. Serve hot. Makes 4 servings.

TZIMMES LOAF

1 large sweet potato (about 1 lb.peeled and grated
1 lb. carrots (4-5 medium), peeled and grated
1 medium onion, peeled and grated
1 cup canned unsweetened crushed pineapple with its juice
1 1-inch piece fresh ginger, peeled and grated
1 cup pitted prunes, coarsely chopped
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
3 eggs
1 cup flour
½ cup olive oil
¼ cup light brown sugar
3 tbsp. rum or brandy
salt and pepper

Preheat the oven to 375. In a bowl, mix all the ingredients thoroughly, but don't squeeze the mixture or you will extract moisture, and the end product will be soggy. Pour into a greased 10-inch round cake pan or tube pan. Bake for 1 hour or until a knife inserted in the centre comes out clean. Cut into slices. Serve warm. Makes 10 side-dish servings.

Gefilte fish – a classic favourite

By GLENDA MINDLIN
Special to The CJN

I grew up with my grandmother's (Ma's) fried gefilte fish and the poached kind that my mother still makes for Rosh Hashanah and Passover. Handing down recipes from mother to daughter is common among eastern European and Russian Jews.

Now I have the opportunity to pass down this tradition to my daughter Allison, who is 21.

But I want to give her more than just the recipe. There's so much to discover about fish in Jewish cooking.

I always thought this cultural specialty was made with the same ingredients – just handled differently before cooking. Wrong! Choosing the right combination of fish, traditionally fish found in fresh water, is as varied as there are people in a family. Ground fish may contain pike, whitefish or carp, as these were most common in eastern Europe, but pickerel, lake trout and salmon are also used today. Whitefish makes the mixture softer. Carp adds flavour and richness but darkens the colour. I proudly inform Allison that whitefish is high in omega-3 fatty acids, believed to be helpful in preventing heart disease.

I want my daughter to know the roots of kosher fish from the Torah. Leviticus, Chapter 11, Verse 9, describes kosher (fit or proper) fish: "These you may eat of all that live in water, whether in sea or streams, that has fins and scales."

The Talmud cites the expectation that all fish with scales have fins, but the converse is not necessarily true – the presence of fins is not an indication that there are scales.

Scales are defined as ones that can be removed without tearing the skin from the flesh. Whole fish visible to the customer ensures the presence of fins and scales. Fileted and pre-ground fish are not identifiable as kosher. In these forms, some indication of the fish's origin guarantees that the fish has fins and scales. Someone who observes kashrut learns how to determine which fish are kosher. The fish should be bought from a store that is supervised by a mashgiach.

The entire fish, including the blood, may be eaten and requires no special home preparation. Hence the use of the fish's head for the stock. Allison is less excited about handling this part of the vertebrate.

Freshwater fish may come from any of the Great Lakes – Huron, Erie, Michigan, or even Lake Winnipeg and Georgian Bay.

A fishmonger on the Bathurst Street strip states that freshly caught fish is immediately gutted to ensure the flesh remains undamaged. The only exception to this is the carp, which can be found alive, particularly at holiday time. The gutted fish, otherwise untouched, is packed in ice and sold to the wholesaler and retailer in this form.

Gefilte fish is simple to make, but it can take some time to get the "feel" of it and just the right seasoning. For the Old World touch, try mixing the ingredients in a large wooden bowl with a metal "hucker" (chopper).

Fish:
3 lb. ground fish – 2 parts whitefish and 1 part pickerel
4 eggs
1 onion
2-3 tsp. kosher salt
1 tsp. pepper
2-3 tbsp. matzah meal

Using a large wooden or other big bowl mix all the ingredients well. Form the fish mixture into oval shapes, using about 2-3 tbsp. each, and carefully drop the balls into gently boiling stock.

If you are a novice, I strongly advise that you put a little of the stock in a saucepan, and poach a small ball for about 15 minutes. Then cool and taste for seasoning.

After simmering the fish covered for about 1 hour, remove the fish to a platter and place a cooked carrot coin on top of each fish ball. It is best to cook these carrots separately. Discard all the remaining bones and vegetables that remain in the pot. Cool the fish and refrigerate.

CLASSIC BAKED GEFILTE FISH

By cousin Gerry Prenick

2 lb. ground fish – any combination of pike, pickerel, whitefish and lake trout
3 eggs
2 tsp. salt
6-8 tbsp. sugar – a Galician (southern Polish) tradition
1 scant tsp. pepper
1-2 tbsp. matzah meal
2 large grated carrots
1 Spanish onion, chopped
2-3 tbsp. oil
½ cup ice water

Preheat oven to 350. Sauté onion and carrots in oil. Cool. Mix all the fish together. Put fish in the food processor. Add all the remaining ingredients and give the mixer a few spins. Divide the mixture and put it into 2 lightly oiled glass loaf pans. Put a piece of tin foil under as sometimes it bubbles over. Bake covered with waxed or parchment paper for 1–1¼ hours. Remove the cover for the last 10 minutes. Cool and refrigerate. Slice to serve

HELPFUL HINTS

- To get the best selection of fish, shop a day or two before the holiday.
- You can buy filleted fish and grind it yourself or use the food processor.
- The fish tastes better the day after it's cooked.
- Homemade horseradish is great with any gefilte fish. Peel and cut large coins of radish and place in the food processor. Turn on the motor and firmly hold the processor as it dances. Add sufficient vinegar to remove the dryness – more than you would think. Add 1-3 tsp. of sugar depending on the quantity of radish. A small grated beet will make it red.

A very special first day of school

The first day back to school each year is always significant, but for one group of youngsters and their parents, September 2, 2003 was especially meaningful.

That was the day when 89 students filed into their classes at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School in its permanent home in the newly renovated Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. The opening was made official when the mezuzah was placed on the school's door, with UJA Federation leaders, donors and many community supporters looking on.

The school recently signed a new, seven-year lease with the Nadal Centre.

"It was indeed a special opening day," says principal Elysa Cohen. "This opening day was more than a year in the making, and being back in the Nadal Centre really gives us the sense of community and of coming home again."

Michael Sue Goldblatt, president of the school since February 2002, echoed Cohen's sentiments.

"It was exciting and wonderful to be there, at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, as we started our sixth year of classes," says Goldblatt. "Six years ago, a small group of parents and educators founded the Downtown Jewish Day School, here in this very building, with only 10 children. We have certainly grown."

However, if not for the efforts of many dedicated supporters and volunteers, these opening day festivities might never have happened.

Originally opened in 1998, Toronto's Downtown Jewish Day School quickly learned the growing pains synonymous with any business venture.

The school, which then operated out of the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (BJCC), was started as a labour of love in 1998 by a group of ambitious and committed parents who had earlier sent their three and four-year-old children to the BJCC's nursery and junior kindergarten. The school had 10 students enrolled in its first year.

In 1998, the school, struggling to make ends meet with tuitions falling short of covering operating costs, received a much-needed shot in the arm in the form of a grant of $200,000 U.S. from Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE) thanks to UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) initiative. With that financial help, the school was able to expand to 61 students.

However, later that year, the DJDS was in financial crisis. It required an immediate cash infusion of $250,000 just to keep the doors open until the end of the year.

In 2000, as renovations began to transform the BJCC into the new Miles Nadal JCC, a JTT project, this pioneering group was forced to look for new quarters. The school moved out of the BJCC into a rental facility (a vacant Catholic School) during renovations.

However, after meetings led by JTT, the school was able to head home once again, into the new Nadal Centre, to become part of the 'Dream Downtown.'

JTT was then able to identify a donor - the Paul Penna estate. The executors of the estate determined that his passion for children and Jewish education during his lifetime made the school the perfect vehicle to honour his memory.

"I've always thought that the most important things in life are relationships," says Goldblatt. "The relationship we've had with JTT brought us to where we are. We're back in the Nadal Centre now, which is truly our home."

Pups for Peace: sniffing out trouble

Shortly after the 2002 Passover suicide bombing at Netanya's Park Hotel that killed 20 Israelis, Yuval Rotem, Israel's consul general in Los Angeles, received an intriguing e-mail message from Santa Monica, California.

Glen Yago, the director of capital studies at the Milken Institute - an independent economic think tank whose mission is to improve the lives and economic conditions of people in the U.S. and around the world - proposed to Rotem the idea of starting a local bomb detection school for dogs, which could then send the trained animals to, quite literally, sniff out and prevent terrorist attacks in Israel.

After getting the go-ahead from the Foreign Ministry in Israel, Rotem gave Yago the okay, and just five months later, the Israeli Defence Forces had an extra 17 highly trained canines to sniff out bombs, as Pups for Peace was born.

"A bomb dog is not a panacea, but it is the most effective detection device we have available to us at this time," says Mike Herstik, co-founder of PFP and its Director of Canine Operations. "The dogs search for an odor, a scent, and when they find it, they point it out to their handlers."

"Of course, Israel already had dogs performing this task, but they simply needed more," says Mike Freedland, 42, Canadian fundraising chair, Pups for Peace. "Unfortunately, unlike places like Toronto, where these dogs are not usually required, Israel needs a lot of them at a lot of different events, at airports, bus terminals, even movie theatres."

A recent request for 80 dogs from Pups for Peace was made by Israel's Egged Bus Company following a highly successful pilot project that had been carried out between Egged and the Transportation Ministry.

"They were so happy with the results that they placed the order for 80 dogs," says Freedland.

"We submitted a proposal to Toronto UJA to donate money, and through its 2003 Israel Emergency Campaign, UJA contributed around $150,000," says Freedland. "This money goes to buying more dogs, their training, and some of their general expenses such as housing, food, and medical bills."

Thanks to their outstanding sense of smell, these four-legged friends - which cost about $10,000 U.S. each - make surprisingly fast and efficient workers. In fact, according to a report from the U.S. Customs Service, a dog can search 400 to 500 packages per half hour. Another report from the U.S. Navy compared the accuracy and speed of detection dogs to that of human searches and detection machines and found that the dog was the fastest and most accurate.

"Our mission is to detect terrorism in order to save lives at civilian sites all over the world," says Yago. "I sincerely believe that Pups for Peace can make a really valuable contribution to restoring the conditions necessary for people to be able to go back to the peace process."

One of the highly trained Pups for Peace canines demonstrates his bomb-detecting skills.

Draw winner thrilled with tickets to Israel

On August 20, Perry Budovitch and a friend were among the more than 1,000 people at Toronto's Royal York Hotel for the official launch of UJA Federation Campaign 2004.

Budovitch's decision to attend proved to be especially fortuitous, because he was named the winner of two Air Canada airline tickets to Israel from a draw at the launch.

"It was unbelievable," says Budovitch, a 44-year-old Montrealer who moved to Toronto in 1992. "There I was, watching the keynote speaker, Malcolm Hoenlein, who was giving this amazing, passionate and inspirational speech about Israel and the state of Jewry, and the next thing you know they're announcing the winner of plane tickets to Israel."

Wendy Posluns – Campaign Launch Chair (along with Michael Diamond) and Jacob Bregman congratulate Perry Budovitch, winner of two free airline tickets to Israel, at the UJA Federation launch of Campaign 2004 – For Israel and the Jewish World.

Budovitch says he and his friend both did a double take when they heard the winning ticket number, and it took a few seconds for him to realize he had won.

"I've never won anything before," says Budovitch, who, not coincidentally, bought a lottery ticket the next day. "The last time I was in Israel was in 1983 – 20 years ago – but I am so excited about going back there, to see how the land has changed. I think it's wonderful that UJA awarded the prize because Israel needs as many of us to go to Israel now as possible."

Another gentleman who will benefit from Budovitch's good fortune is 80-year-old Jack Budovitch, Perry's father.

"When I heard that my son had won tickets to Israel, I was thrilled and excited," says Budovitch Sr. "I have never been to Israel and I've always wanted to go. This is a wonderful opportunity. Israel needs us."

For the younger Budovitch, choosing his travel partner was easy.

"Definitely, it was going to be my dad," he says. "I thought of him right away. I just thought that it would be a wonderful thing to bring him since he's never been there before. He's always wanted to go to Israel, but, unfortunately, life goes by so quickly. I guess sometimes people just need a push to do things, and for my dad, these tickets will definitely be that push."

Budovitch is hoping to use their tickets to Israel by joining one of UJA Federation's monthly solidarity missions.

"It would be a dream come true to spend Pesach in Israel with my father. I can't imagine how special it would be there with him, to experience that, especially if I could get my brother, Joel, to come with us. I was with Joel, back in 1983, the last time I was there."

Super Sunday brings out UJA Federation's superheroes

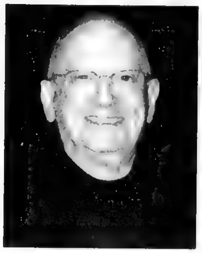
Telethons set to start for urgent UJA Federation campaign

By WENDY LAMPERT

In just a few days, UJA Federation Super Sunday / Super Week will begin, during which hundreds of volunteers will pick up the phones in the first critical set of telethons during Campaign 2004 – For Israel and the Jewish World. The campaign has already raised more than $23 million.

Telethons, through which more than 10,000 members of the community are contacted each year, are crucial to the success of UJA Federation campaigns, especially this year when Israel is reeling from ongoing terror attacks. Donations to Campaign 2004 will fund, among other initiatives, support for children who have lost their parents in terror attacks.

All Campaign 2004 contributions beyond those required for core needs will be allocated to three strategic initiatives:



Don Bennett

- Financial support for Israel's deteriorating social service network, including additional help for children whose parents were killed in terror attacks.
- Stepped up efforts to combat a worldwide wave of anti-Israel and anti-Semitic hatred, through the new national Israel Emergency Cabinet.
- Education and training for our next Jewish generation to answer those who preach anti-Israel and anti-Semitic hatred.

Super Week participants are often the unsung heroes of UJA Federation campaigns. They are the dedicated volunteers staffing the phones and performing other important telethon tasks. Together, they raise more than $5 million annually through a community effort that spans all ages.

Aliza Glatter works the phones for UJA.

And without a doubt, veteran telethoners Don Bennett and Aliza Glatter will be there to lend a hand when Campaign 2004 Super Week kicks off on Sunday, September 21.

Don first got involved with UJA Federation in 1959, when he arrived in Canada from Britain, and he has been an avid telethon volunteer since 1975. "I'm good on the phone, and if I can make a difference in my own community, in Israel, or for Jews in need in other parts of the world, I want to do my part," he says.

"This is a great way to get involved in your community," says Aliza Glatter, a 16-year-old CHAT student who became active with telethons three years ago. She has gotten such fulfillment out of the experience that this year she became part of the Super Week volunteer recruitment committee.

"Super Sunday / Super Week is an experience that nobody should miss," she says.

"With Israel constantly threatened by terror, during a severe recession, and with anti-Semitism looming ever larger around the world, raising funds through telethons to help support Israel and the Jewish people is truly urgent," adds Bennett. "Each person who participates today is literally changing a life tomorrow."

Bennett is especially encouraged by the number of young people who participate. "They are the future of the Jewish people, and it's very important for them to get involved at an early age. They learn leadership skills, and start to understand how important it is to support the Jewish people now so that we remain strong into the future."

Aliza agrees. "I'm getting closer to university, and I'm realizing that it could be me next year. It's time to get the resources to help us fight anti-Semitism now."

York U student confronts anti-Israel intimidation

For many Canadian Jewish students today, defending Israel's right to exist has become a far too common task.

Shira Zeliger, a 19-year-old student at York University knows all too well about anti-Israel and anti-Semitic influences plaguing Canadian colleges and universities, and she is doing everything in her power to counter that hatred.

Majoring in Judaic Studies, Zeliger, a passionate, creative, and articulate second year student, is York's Israel Affairs co-chairperson for Hillel, the campus organization, strongly supported by UJA Federation that serves Jewish students in the Greater Toronto area. She has been involved in Toronto's Jewish community ever since she can remember, and has no intention of letting up now.

"My parents were always very involved in the Jewish world and since I was young, I would help out in whatever way I could. I have always wanted to follow in their footsteps, and now at York, I have that opportunity, and I'm excited about it."

A product of Toronto's Jewish day school system – she attended Bialik Hebrew Day School before moving on to CHAT in 1998 – Zeliger was quick to connect with York's Jewish scene.

Hillel

"I admit, I came from a somewhat sheltered life having attended CHAT, so, initially, there was a bit of a culture shock when I got to York," she says. "It was pretty impersonal, especially sitting in a lecture with 500 others, and I wanted to find my place within a Jewish organization on campus as quickly as possible."

Enter Hillel, where Zeliger applied to be a part of its Israel Affairs Committee. She was accepted and the rest is history.

"Last year was probably the worst year on campus in terms of anti-Israel and anti-Semitic rhetoric," says Zeliger. "One of the first things I did was set up a table promoting various Israel issues and programs designed to bring students together to learn – in a low key, subtle way – about Israel and the truth about Israel," says Zeliger. "I love Hillel's motto which is 'Wherever we stand, we stand with Israel.'"

Immediately after setting up shop in her York corridor, Zeliger realized things were not going to be quite so simple.

"Right across from our table was a table set up by the Middle Eastern Students Association and a group called Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights," she says. "Their table would be full of stuff talking about the 'Israeli occupation,' and they would always try to provoke us."

Zeliger has seen the anti-Semitic posters, signs, and buttons complete with swastikas and "stop the Israeli occupation" rhetoric all around her and feels that education is the key to stopping it.

"On campus I try to educate people as to what Israel is really all about," she says. "And it's not just non-Jews who need an education – in fact, there are far too many Jewish students who aren't educated about the issues and are simply not equipped with the tools they need to fight. I plan to teach as many as will listen – through various programs for all faiths – about Israel."

Zeliger knows that once her university days are completed, her task of educating people about Israel must continue.

"Of course," she says. "On campus you really have to advocate on Israel's behalf almost on a daily basis – much more than I think you'd have to in the real world. Still, I want to continue to fight for Israel after university by teaching as many people as I can about the truth."

Colors of Hope

The life of Omer Golan was changed irrevocably one Friday afternoon in December 2000 in the Jordan Valley. Omer, then a soldier, a poet and musician, was severely injured by a suicide bomber who detonated a large explosive charge. His recuperation was considered a medical miracle. That is the reason why the new exhibition of his paintings has been called "Rebirth."

Omer Golan and his wife, Tal

Omer will donate 50% of the proceeds of the exhibition -- currently being shown in Amsterdam -- to the Jewish Agency's (JAFI) Fund for Victims of Terror, which provided him with support during his long period of his convalescence. "I'm interested in working with Palestinian artists," he says. "Together we'll be able to create an exhibition for the benefit of all of us."
The Fund was set up to provide victims and their family members with direct assistance in addition to financial aid provided by the Israeli government. The Fund has assisted, among others, more than 400 orphans who lost their parents as a result of terror attacks during the past two years.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – through donations to its 2002 and 2003 annual campaigns – has already sent nearly $2 million to JAFI's Fund for Victims of Terror. The Jewish Agency for Israel is UJA Federation's overseas partner.

"We were serving at Kibbutz Ma'oz Chayim in the Jordan Valley," recounts Omer. "In an instant everything changed on December 22, 2000. I stopped on my way to the Kibbutz at a café near the bus station. A young Arab was sitting there, wearing jeans and a red plaid shirt. He looked me in the eyes and smoked a cigarette. It didn't even cross my mind that he was choosing me as his victim. He had been there for about two hours. I left the café and walked towards the bus when suddenly the terrorist attached himself to me from behind. He didn't say a word. With one hand I tried to pull him away and with the other hand I tried to draw my gun. Then he exploded. I absorbed all the blast of the explosive charge."

The idea of donating the proceeds from the exhibition came to Omer and his wife Tal, when they attended a ceremony for the JAFI fund.

UJA Federation committee seeks replacement for president

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

The search is well underway for the next president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, following the recent announcement by Dr. Allan Reitzes that he intends to step down after 12 years in the position.

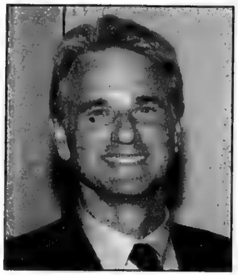
Search committee chair Ralph Shedletsky, immediate past chair of the board, feels confident that the transition will be a smooth one and expects to have Reitzes' successor in place by early 2004.

Dr. Allan Reitzes

"It's obviously with mixed emotions that we must say goodbye to Allan," says Shedletsky, "but, at the same time, we are fortunate that his tremendous leadership will remain intact until a replacement is found."

The search for his replacement is being lead by a committee made up of eight current and prior members of UJA's lay leadership, including past presidents.

"The committee has enlisted the services of a senior executive with United Jewish Communities (UJC) in New York, specializing in executive recruitment, to help us conduct a North America wide search," says Shedletsky. "We are very excited to be working with UJC professionals who are so knowledgeable concerning recruitment of senior Jewish communal professionals across North America. In addition to working with them, we will be running ads locally, nationally, and in the United States."



Ralph Shedletsky, Chair, UJA Federation's search committee

The UJA search committee will continue to consult with a broad spectrum of lay and professional leaders to solicit their input regarding future leadership.

"Our goal is to select the best possible leader for Toronto's outstanding Jewish community and we are encouraged by the fact that our preliminary consultations indicate that Toronto is viewed as one of the preeminent Jewish communities in North America - a very desirable community for senior executives."

Shuk in the Park

A few thousand people recently made their way to SHUK IN THE PARK at Suydam Park in Toronto's Spadina Village. Proceeds from this year's SHUK - an outdoor marketplace complete with Israeli wares, kosher food and music - went to Orr Shalom which provides group foster homes for Israeli children at risk. The shuk, jointly organized by Olive Branch for Israel and Reviving Eden, was supported by a number of community organizations including the Israel Now Consortium, under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consulate General of Israel.

"This year's shuk was very exciting," says organizer Grae Sibelman. "So many people came out and had a great time for a great cause. It was a tremendous success and my hope is that the people who were there this year become part of next year's organizing committee."

Girls Town Jerusalem - From pigtails to wedding dresses

It has been said that necessity is the mother of invention, and nowhere is that axiom more true than in Bayit Lepletot – Girls Town Jerusalem.

Back in 1950, hundreds of thousands of Holocaust refugees flooded into the welcoming arms of the State of Israel. Many of those in need of a new home were orphans.

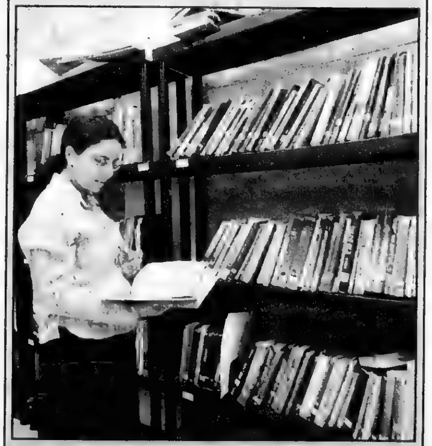
Bayit Lepletot (which translates to "home for refugees") started with eight of those war orphans in a small room rented in Jerusalem. The number of girls cared for quickly grew, first as more refugees arrived, followed by a wave of immigration from all over the world.

"Through the years we have kept our doors wide open for these children irrespective of whether or not we had the proper funds or the place to house these children," says Rabbi Samuel Stern, Founder and Executive Director of the orphanage. "It is always better to crowd a room with more children than to turn down a child in need."

Following the boom in immigration to Israel from the Former Soviet Union, scores of Russian children arrived and Bayit Lepletot needed to expand. Consequently, a sister project, Girls Town Jerusalem was hatched. Girls are welcomed from the age of 3, until around 25, or until they get married. In fact, when one of the young women in its care is to be married, Girls Town Jerusalem makes the wedding itself, right on their premises. If, however, a girl chooses to leave, she has the legal right to do so at the age of 18. The girls may continue to live at the home while they work or perform their mandatory army service.

Today, the new campus includes additional dormitory space, kitchen and dining halls, landscaped gardens, recreational facilities and a vocational training centre. There are currently around 600 girls at the facility, from 32 countries including Iran and Iraq.

"We feel that from their infanthood, until they have a husband and their own home, we will be their family," says Rabbi Stern. "We are proud to represent a United Nations of worldwide Jewry, and we are especially proud to take care of the girls from age 3 to 25, so that they are not shuffled around from one institution to another. We simply do not feel that that is the proper thing to do."



One of the residents of Girls Town Jerusalem checks out the latest addition to the library.

Chair, Volunteer Relations, UJA Federation

Changing Jewish lives is all in the family

Peter Ekstein

The other day someone asked me why I volunteer for UJA.

I suppose that I understood from an early age that when Jews were in trouble, other Jews helped. That's what Jews did. Somehow I always understood that the Jewish people were just one big family, and that when your family needs help, there's no one else they can rely on but you. Perhaps it was from tagging along with my mother delivering Meals on Wheels when I was just a little kid, or maybe it was from growing up on stories of the Holocaust, and how my mom was helped by Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) when she arrived in Canada as a child survivor in 1948. On June 5 1967, on the eve of the Six Day War, I remember my father buying an Israel Bond for my mother for their 13th wedding anniversary; and when I was a teenager, my parents sponsored a family from the Soviet Union. I remember giving my train set to their young son, who had no toys of his own.

When I was 15 years old, my mom dragged me to my first UJA Super Sunday telethon. I made a few calls, raised a few bucks, and for the first time, felt like I was doing my part to help the cause. Slowly I got a little more involved, and the more I did, the more I learned of the tremendous and somewhat overwhelming needs of Jewish communities here at home and around the world. How could we possibly help all of these people? One step at a time. That's what became crystal clear to me - whether it was delivering a box of food staples on behalf of the Joint Distribution Committee to an elderly woman in a shtetl outside of Kishniev, who could have been my grandmother, or offering a job to a refugee from Sarajevo, who had come to Toronto through the help of the Jewish Agency and JIAS. Slowly but surely the lessons of my youth merged with my experiences and I understood. This was my family, and if I didn't help them, who else would. I understood that by volunteering at UJA, I wasn't just raising money, I was actually improving or even saving people's lives. One dollar at a time, one individual at a time.

Today, the needs of the Jewish world are once again extremely urgent. Our brothers and sisters in Israel, around the world and here at home need our support. Anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism are raging. We must speak out, and we must give our children, my children, the tools to deal with these new realities. This is your family! It's your obligation to help, for if you don't, who will?

Remember, it's not about campaigns, or telethons, or raising money. It's about Jewish lives. If you come out and volunteer, you will make a difference. Your commitment today will change a life tomorrow, and trust me, you'll feel great doing it.

It's what Jews do.

Exciting Leadership Institute launched in Toronto

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

A new initiative was launched in Toronto earlier this month, and the program promises to play a key role in developing Jewish leaders.

The New Leadership Institute, made possible with the support of the Sam Cohen Family Foundation, via a unique partnership between the Hartman Institute of Jerusalem and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, provides 30- to 45-year-old donors with the opportunity to be part of this innovative and interactive learning process.

"The Shalom Hartman Institute, based in Jerusalem, is one of the Jewish world's preeminent educational institutions and think tanks," says Cohen, President of Canadian Friends of the Shalom Hartman Institute CFSHI). "My wife Beverley and I established an endowment fund with the CFSHI to transmit the learning and knowledge developed at the Institute to the Toronto community. I believe that the approach of the Institute to the key issues affecting Israel and the Jewish people and its profound respect for tradition combined with a commitment to modernity, will provide a great foundation of learning for the next generation of leadership in our community."

Sam and Beverley Cohen

Through the New Leadership Institute, which held its inaugural session on September 2, participants will explore creative approaches to Jewish principles - overseen by professional Jewish educators - by learning together, and challenging each other. The program is designed to enhance the understanding of important ethical values that we – as Jews – face in every aspect of our daily lives, through the study of different Jewish practices and beliefs.

The New Leadership Institute is chaired by Karen Basian, Michael Buckstein, Stephen Goldhar, Antony Karabus, and Mark Waldman.

Looking for answers at Jerusalem's Shalom Hartman Institute

The kickoff session, entitled The Foundations of Moral Obligations, tackled the issue of what it means today to be considered a moral Jew. Rabbi Donniel Hartman, Co-Director of Shalom Hartman Institute, was on hand to lead the session.

"I thought that the first session was absolutely brilliant," says Basian. "Donniel Hartman is one of the leading Jewish scholars in the world and the way he shared his favourite texts with us and what they meant to him was very powerful. He showed us that one of the great things about Judaism is that you can challenge one another, have different interpretations, and find out exactly what Judaism is to you. This is an important aspect of the Institute, sharing ideas and beliefs and helping to build a strong and educated foundation for tomorrow's Jewish leaders."

Toronto teen makes music in Israel

Thanks to Toronto's Evan Goldenberg, a young Israeli boy is living his dream in Israel today – the dream of learning how to play the violin at the Gilo Music Conservatory.

When Goldenberg, 14, was preparing for his bar mitzvah in June 2002, he wasn't thinking only of himself, but also about how his bar mitzvah money could be used to benefit the life of an Israeli youngster.

Goldenberg, who celebrated his bar mitzvah on June 15 at Toronto's Adath Israel Synagogue, is a talented musician, specializing in piano and violin. He decided that supporting the arts in Israel is vital, especially at this time.

"I figured that with Israel going through so much for the past few years, and the government redirecting a lot of money to defence, other programs must be hurting," says the articulate Goldenberg. "I believe that it's important - especially during really bad times - that people can enjoy the arts, especially music. It lifts people's spirits."

With that philosophy in mind, Goldenberg decided that he wanted to combine his love for music with his passion for Israel and find a way to donate his bar mitzvah gifts to benefit an Israeli music lover of his age.

"Evan was very clear from the outset about how he'd like to use his bar mitzvah money," says his proud mother, Sari. "We called UJA Federation and told them how we wanted to help, and they were terrific. Eventually, they found the perfect place to send Evan's money."

That place turned out to be the Music Conservatory in Gilo, a southern suburb of Jerusalem, which has come under frequent Palestinian attack. The fortunate young Israeli who benefited from Evan's generosity was Roei Appelbon.

"UJA told me that with the amount of money I could donate - around $1,200 - I could afford to pay for Roei's lessons for one whole year, as well as buy him a new violin. So that's what we did," says Goldenberg.

"I'm so proud of my son, especially in the way he sees the big picture. He took his Jewishness and his musical talents and brought them together for the sole purpose of helping someone less fortunate than himself. His decision represents much of what his father, Ron, and I have tried to teach him," says Sari.

According to the musical benefactor himself, you don't have to be a music lover to help Israel.

"Not everyone is interested in the arts," says Goldenberg. "But there are plenty of other ways that we can help Israelis, and I know other people my age are investigating those possibilities."

Argentine immigrants boost day school numbers

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — An increase this fall in the number of Argentine immigrants in some Winnipeg Jewish day schools has helped to offset ongoing enrolment declines of the last few years, educators say.

Enrolment at the Board of Jewish Education's Gray Academy, the city's largest Jewish day school and only Jewish K-12 program, stands at 590, more than the 485 students it projected, but considerably fewer than the approximately 800 students it had when it moved into the new Asper Campus in south Winnipeg in 1997.

The difference comes primarily from Argentine immigrants, said Jack Cipilinsky, director of finance for the Winnipeg Board of Jewish education.

This year, Gray Academy has welcomed more than 70 new children whose families have come to Winnipeg, mainly from Argentina, within the past couple of years, he said.

While a large number of older Jewish students are choosing to attend regular public high schools or prestigious non-Jewish programs such as St. John's-Ravenscourt School, Winnipeg's top private school, or the University of Winnipeg Collegiate – where an estimated one-third or more of the students are Jewish – almost all younger Jewish children are enrolled in one of the city's five Jewish elementary day school programs.

Despite that, Cipilinsky said, long-term demographic trends in the Winnipeg Jewish community have led to an overall decline in day school enrolment, particularly at Gray Academy.

"There just aren't as many pre-schoolers in the community as there used to be," he said.

"In the 1970s and '80s, there used to be over 150 three- and four-year-olds in the community and [Gray Academy] would get half of them. Now there may be 70 to 75 overall in those age groups. We have 50 kids coming into our junior kindergarten program this year, but just 30 in kindergarten."

But the Argentine students "have been a breath of fresh air," he said.

"They have had a tremendous impact on our school system," Cipilinsky said. "Ten per cent of our student body are Argentine kids. You hear Spanish being spoken all over the place here."

Cipilinsky said he is also optimistic about the impact a new administration will have on Gray Academy. The new team consists of head of school Rory Paul, a longtime principal in the Seven Oaks School Division in north Winnipeg; Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate principal Hart Sera, a longtime principal in Winnipeg School Division No. 1; and Shaul Wachsstock, an educator from Belgium by way of Israel, who fills the long-vacant position of director of Judaic studies.

"The teachers and parents are anticipating new ideas and projects from them," Cipilinsky says. "We believe this new team will give our school increased credibility."

The Hebrew bilingual program at Brock Corydon Elementary School (one of the public schools that offer half-day Hebrew programs) in south Winnipeg also seems to be benefiting from Argentine immigration. Registration is up to 175, about five more than last year, and the kindergarten has 26 children, up six from last year.

The Hebrew program at Margaret Park Elementary School, Brock Corydon's equivalent in north Winnipeg and the principal Jewish day school program in that part of the city, has an enrolment of 86 students this year (compared to 90 last year), continuing a decline that has been ongoing for the past eight years. Not only do the majority of young Jewish families now live in south Winnipeg, but all of the Argentine families have settled there.

"We have 12 students in kindergarten this year," said Margaret Park principal Pat Stefanchuk. "We have some concern about next year, because we haven't been able to identify many children in our area who are the appropriate age."

Winnipeg also has two Orthodox day schools. Ohr haTorah, which has classes at the Herzlia Synagogue in south Winnipeg, is going into its sixth year with a significantly smaller student body. This year, the school has 24 students spread over seven grades (including kindergarten), compared to about 40 last year.

A spokesperson said a number of students simply left for other programs.

The other Orthodox elementary school, located in north Winnipeg, is a long-running Chabad program for the small number of Chabad families in the city.

Livingston was a prominent Hamilton furrier

Obituary

HAMILTON — Jordan Livingston, a prominent furrier who devoted much of his life to volunteerism, died last month at age 76.

He headed Livingston Furs Ltd. until his retirement in the mid-1990s, and was a committed volunteer who was recognized for his work on behalf of a number of organizations.

He was to be inducted into the Hamilton Gallery of Distinction this November.

In the 1940s, Livingston dreamed of becoming an eye doctor, but he was turned away from medical school in Toronto because it had met its Jewish quota, said his son, Alan Livingston.

Jordan Livingston came to Hamilton in 1950 and took over Warner W. Howell Furs, which was established in 1910. Alan succeeded him, and the store operated in downtown Hamilton until 2001,when it moved to Burlington.

In his volunteer work, Livingston was most recently chair of the board of governors of the Art Gallery of Hamilton; chair of the Retail Fur Council of Canada; vice-chair of the Boris Brott Musical Festival; and a member of numerous committees, including St. Joseph's Hospital Research Foundation and the board of the Canadian Museum of Nature in Ottawa.

He was a past president of Beth Jacob Synagogue as well as a past chair of both the Hamilton Hebrew School Board and Beth Jacob Hebrew School.

He also served as president of the Art Gallery of Hamilton and the Hamilton Downtown Business Association, and was a member of the Mayor's Task Force.

He received the Hamilton Volunteer of the Year Award in 1991 and was one of five finalists nominated as Citizen of the Year.

His son said that volunteering is a family tradition. In the 1930s, Jordan Livingston's father Albert was a co-founder with Marshall Gold, of Camp Tamarac, which was established as a Jewish Boy Scouts camp.

In his eulogy, Alan said his father always carried around a note from his own father about how important it was for a person to create a good name.

"The need to volunteer was key. Dad took his volunteer positions and commitments so very seriously — as strongly as if his life depended on them. He truly believed in volunteerism."

Rabbi Mark Biller of Beth Jacob Synagogue said Jordan Livingston was "a contributor, a giver of means, time and thought."

Rabbi Biller described Livingston as "a one-man think tank… a designer of organizations… a mediator… a man who knew instinctively what must be done, or thought about it until he created a solution."

Last summer, Livingston started a special programs committee at Beth Jacob, out of which a Klezmer group was formed. It then entertained at a concert that attracted 400 people, Rabbi Biller said.

Jordan Livingston leaves his wife of 55 years Sylvia, sons Neal, Barry and Alan and daughter-in-law Yael, as well as three grandchildren.

THIS IS THE TIME OF YEAR WHEN WE AS A COMMUNITY PAUSE FOR REFLECTION.

The Ernie Eves Progressive Conservative Government has taken steps to rectify the historic unequal treatment by giving us the Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC).

In that effort, the Ernie Eves PC Government has helped our community provide a more affordable Jewish education for our children to ensure Jewish continuity.

The Ernie Eves PC Government has given us parental choice so that WE can decide what is best for OUR children.

Dalton McGuinty and the Liberals want to take the Tax Credit away from us. Dalton McGuinty has said, "All of Ontario knows where I stand when it comes to your private school tax credit: we will cancel it... No strings or standards will save it." (Hansard, Oct. 22, 2002).

If Dalton McGuinty and the Liberals win, they will remove the Tax Credit forever COSTING EVERY DAY SCHOOL PARENT THOUSANDS OF DOLLARS PER YEAR. The Liberals will hurt our community!

We now have a unique opportunity to ensure that this funding will continue into the future.

OCTOBER 2 is the date of our Provincial Election. It gives each of us a chance as individuals to acknowledge the good-will shown towards our community by the Ernie Eves PC Government.

WE URGE YOU TO SUPPORT THE PC CANDIDATES ANY WAY YOU CAN. VOLUNTEER TO HELP GET OUT THE VOTE.

‘Judges meet supreme test in war on terror’

Once any democratic nation uses undemocratic means to wage war, its very foundation is threatened, he told an audience of about 250 lawyers, judges and donors.

“Terrorism poses difficulty for any country, but especially a democracy, which cannot use any means to respond. Democracies often must fight with one hand tied behind their back, but they nonetheless have the upper hand.”

Democracies, he said, are fragile and need constant tending. “We cannot take [democracy] for granted. If democracy can be perverted in [Nazi] Germany, it can happen anywhere.”

The 67-year-old Barak, who joined the Supreme Court court in 1978 and became its chief justice in 1995, is known for rulings that have upheld Palestinian human rights and limited the army’s response to terrorism.

Detractors have accused his court of high levels of judicial activism and of interfering in the political battle against terror.

But Barak, a former attorney-general of Israel, defended the court’s activist stance as a way of bolstering democracy.

“The purpose of judicial power is to protect democracy and human rights. We cannot limit it to peace. The real test comes in war and terror, [which] must not deprive us of our character.

“Judges meet their supreme test in war and terror.”

The power of courts “fortifies and strengthens people in the long term, even if it makes the war on terror harder. It makes the struggle worthwhile.”

Among the rulings handed down by Barak’s court have been prohibitions on the use of Palestinian prisoners as bargaining chips for Israeli prisoners; on the torture of suspected terrorists, even if it would mean saving lives; and on attacks on Palestinian ambulances, even if the vehicles are suspected of carrying weapons or terrorists.

Barak said those and other decisions reflect the need to strike a balance between protecting citizens and the state’s values. Or, as he put it, “to protect both from terrorism as well as the means to fight it.”

Despite accusations that Israeli courts are soft on terror, they “do not examine the wisdom of war on terrorism, only its legality,” he said. “Security considerations are not a magic wand. They must be proved by the government [and] must consider human dignity and freedom.”

Ultimately, the preservation of democracy is paramount to a state’s survival. And “even if the state loses, the rule of law wins.”

But Barak’s views are not shared by all Israelis, as recent polls show slightly more than half of all Israeli Jews believe Israeli Arabs should not have equal rights, and that only 77 per cent of those surveyed believe democracy is the best form of government for Israel.

Born in Kanaus (Kovno) in Lithuania, Barak was hidden as a child during the Holocaust. He said that experience imbued him not with hatred and recrimination, but with a determined view of the centrality of Israel and the need to ensure its security.

He conceded that reconciling the Jewish state’s democratic values with protecting its citizens isn’t always easy.

“Israel is not just a democracy, but a Jewish democracy. Only a state that gives expression to our heritage can be built on the foundations of human dignity. Only then will it be able to live at peace with itself.

“Even in hard times, we must remain true to ourselves.”

בלדה לישראלי המכוער

אבי זר אביב הוא על פי הגדרתו "סטודנט קנדי ממוצא ישראלי" שבילה רבות מחופשותיו בישראל. יש לו דיעות שמאלניות שהוא גאה בהן, ואת הקיץ האחרון בילה בגדה המערבית והזדעזע ממה שראה. לגדר ההפרדה, למשל, הוא קורא "גדר האפרטהייד". הוא מאמין שישראל עושה עוול גדול לפלשתינאים. מה עשה זר אביב? ישב וכתב בכתב ידו מכתב בן חמישה עמודים לקונסול הישראלי, שבו הוא מבקש-דורש מישראל לשנות מן הקצה את מדיניות ממשלת שרון.

עד כאן-סיפור של סטודנט שאכפת לו, שלדיעותיו שותפים גם ישראלים לא מעטים. מה לעשות-זר אביב חי בקנדה (הוא מברך באנחת רווחה על כך שאינו חי בישראל) וכן, מה לעשות, את המדיניות בישראל קובעים בבחירות דמוקרטיות רק האנשים שחיים שם.

מסתבר שלקונסוליה הישראלית יש קצין-קצינת יחסי ציבור שטרחו לענות לזר אביב על מכתבו. על פי דבריו-הם נתנו לו את גירסת הממשלה ובסוף גם אמרו לו משהו בסגנון "שתתביש לך, אנחנו נספר על זה לאבא שלך". ואכן- שלחו את מכתב הבן לאביו.

זר אביב מציין במכתבו לקונסול שאביו הוא ממנהיגי הקהילה. מי שכתב את המכתב בקונסוליה קרוב לודאי שמכיר את זר אביב האב, ואם לא הכיר- זר אביב הבן עזר לו שיכיר.

עכשיו תשאלו-איך זה שאתה, גידי קורן , רופא עסוק, יודע על השטות הזאת? פשוט מאוד- זר אביב הבן, כמו עגל שחוט, פצח בזעקות מרות ושיטח את העוול הנורא שנעשה לו בסמרטוטון הטורונטאי "Now" ב 29 באוגוסט. ושם- בין עמודי הקולנוע ופרסומות הפורנו מופיעה כתבתו המתייפיפת של זר אביב. הוא מסכם את כתבתו בהצהרה ש "תיזהרו לכם-אם תכתבו לקונסול הישראלי-הוא יגיד אתכם לאבא".

אני רואה את זר אביב מציג בגאווה את הכתבה שלו לכל חבריו, שחושבים כמוהו שהוא קול. אני עם כתבה כזו אפילו לא הייתי עוטף דגים, כי זה היה נותן להם טעם מקולקל. אבל שישאר בינינו.

American Splendour

סרט חדש על אנטי גיבור-נֶעבֶעך אמיתי, ששום דבר בחייו לא עובד כמו שצריך- עד שהוא מחליט לחנצח את חיי העליבות בקומיקס. עד אז שלטו בקומיקס סופרמן וכל שאר דמויות הדמיון והמדע הבדיוני, והינה-סיפור חייו של אנטי-גיבור-נֶעבֶעך אמיתי. סרט רב השראה ומקסים, ששווה לראות, ולו רק כדי להיווכח שסרט אמריקני יכול להיראות אחרת. שמונה בסולם קורן.

Cukoo

עד לפירסום הכתבה הזו-קרוב לוודאי שהסרט הזה יירד מהמסכים-אבל שווה לראות את הוידיאו.

זהו סרט מדהים על חייל רוסי וחייל פיני שאמורים היו למות בימי סיום מלחמת העולם השנייה, אך חייהם ניצלים על ידי אישה ילידה בצפון לאפלאנד. במשך שעה וחצי אתה רואה שלושה אנשים שאינם מבינים מילה משותפת ובכל זאת קורה ביניהם כל כך הרבה. אסור להחמיץ-עשר בסולם קורן.

Globe and Mail, National Post both say Arafat must go

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Globe and Mail and the National Post rarely agree on the key issues of the day, but they find themselves of one mind on the root cause of the tragic state of Israeli-Palestinian relations.

In editorials marking the forced departure of Palestinian Authority prime minister Mahmoud Abbas ("The wrong man quit," Globe, Sept. 8; "No chance of peace with Arafat," Post, Sept. 9) both papers argued that the main impediment to peace is PA President Yasser Arafat.

"From the beginning," says the Globe, "Mr. Arafat undermined and schemed against Mr. Abbas, keeping his own loyalists and cronies in place and jealously hanging on to four of eight Palestinian security branches. Without the security services, Mr. Abbas could not begin to confront terrorism, as he was required to do under the international road map to peace."

Using stronger language, the Post writes: "So long as the murderous Palestinian dictator and terrorist remains in effective control of the PA, neither the U.S.-sponsored road map nor any other peace agreement can be effective."

While the road map has been promoted mainly by the United States, it's important to remember, as the Globe notes, that it is also sponsored and backed by the international community in the form of the United Nations (as well as by the European Union and Russia). Accordingly, the essential condition for the road map's success – the disarming and dismantling of Palestinian terrorist organizations, a condition laid out explicitly in the opening paragraphs of the plan – is something the international community as a whole is insisting upon.

Now that Arafat's machinations against Abbas are common knowledge, an increasing number of media outlets understand that Arafat has betrayed not only his own people but the world at large. Of course, many in the Palestinian camp will continue to blame Israel (and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in particular) for all their failures, as Mustapha Barghouti did on CBC Radio's As It Happens (Sept. 8).

Yet, Likud MK Yuval Steinetz's forceful rebuttal on that program the following evening underscores what has become the majority viewpoint in the West today.

U.S. National Security advisor Condoleezza Rice put her finger on the problem during an interview with CNN's Wolf Blitzer (Sept. 9): Will the PA be committed to "one law, one gun, and one authority" or "is it going to continue to support terrorist organizations running all through the territories, and corruption? That really is the struggle that's going on."

So if there is to be any real movement to peace, the PA must truly reform, something that is virtually impossible as long as Arafat remains on the scene.

"If Mr. Arafat cannot step aside, he should step down," concludes the Globe. Again, the Post goes further, suggesting the time may have come for Arafat's expulsion, problematic as that may be in other respects.

Writing in the Winnipeg Free Press (Sept. 9) Samuel Segev, a veteran Israeli analyst and author, argues that as treacherous as Arafat is, expelling him would likely be more damaging than continuing to isolate him in Ramallah. But that opinion was published before the horrific, twin terrorist attacks later the same day.

In his interview on As It Happens, Steinetz took a more aggressive line. Since the September 1993 signing of the Oslo accords, there have been 10 years of terrorism under Arafat. "Enough is enough," Steinetz said. His solution is to expel Arafat and his cronies and wait for the emergence of an indigenous West Bank Palestinian leadership dedicated to genuine reconciliation with Israel.

Walk set for Sept. 21

On Sunday, Sept. 21, women and their families in more than 70 communities in six provinces are expected to gather by the thousands to help the Heart and Stroke Foundation raise nearly $2 million in the ninth annual Cheerios Mother Daughter Walk for Heart & Stroke.

The walk starts at Ontario Place at 9:30 a.m., rain or shine.

Participants in the Toronto walk at Ontario Place will have a choice of 4km or 8km routes. Ontario Place will also be reserved for walk participants, with activities to entertain walkers and their supporters of all ages, from face painting to taking a plunge in a giant cereal bowl. This year, registration includes a "Play All Day" pass to all Ontario Place attractions.

Registration takes place up until event day at various GTA locations. Registration is free, but participants 16 years and older are asked to raise a minimum of $20. You can register in the following ways: by mail at P.O. Box 3706, Station Industrial Park, Markham, ON L3R 6G9; by fax at 905-479-9707, by phone at 416-489-3724 or 1-888-HSF-INFO, online at www.heartandstroke.ca/walk), or in person at one of the following Heart and Stroke Foundation offices:

- 1920 Yonge Street, 4th Floor, Toronto;
- 1450 Midland Ave., Suite 202, Scarborough;
- 1200 Sheppard Ave. East, Suite 104, North York;
- 48 Village Centre Place, Mississauga.

Event day registration begins at 7:30 a.m. in the registration tent south of parking lot 2 at Ontario Place.

This year, fundraising is even easier with online pledging. Participants must first register online at www.heartandstroke.ca/walk, then send e-mails to friends, family and colleagues whom they hope will sponsor them. Sponsors can pledge online and will receive an e-mailed tax receipt for each donation of $10 or more.

Hillel peace initiative marks first anniversary of demonstration

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Concordia Hillel members extended an olive branch to their fellow students on the first anniversary of the violent demonstration at Concordia University that began as a protest to keep Benjamin Netanyahu, whom Hillel had invited, from speaking on campus.

On Sept. 9, Hillel threw a party, with live bands, cheap beer and kosher hot dogs, and invited all students to come. The “concert for peace” went off without a hitch all evening on the outdoor terrace, under the watchful eye of university security guards. At its peak, about 100 students showed up, including a large number of non-Jewish students.

Hillel put up a poster with the message: “Peace, Paix, Shalom, Salaam.” Except for a large poster promoting Birthright with the slogan “Israel for Free,” the event avoided politics.

A blank board offered students the opportunity to pin up their national flags.

Although its members did not attend, the Muslim Students Association earlier presented Hillel with a gift basket containing, among other items, a Qu’ran and information about Islam, as a goodwill gesture.

Hillel decided to go ahead with the celebration despite the two deadly suicide bombings in Israel that occurred just a few hours earlier.

“We felt we had to start somewhere to promote peace and unity on campus. We want to show that Hillel is supporting student life,” said Hillel co-president Josa Alley, who is in her second year at Concordia studying psychology and religion, after transferring from the University of Victoria. “As the largest student club after the International Students Association, we have a responsibility to maintain a positive atmosphere. There is a general feeling among students that there should be a change of tone. They are very tired.”

Hillel will continue to be “100 per cent supportive” of Israel, but no major speakers or activities have been firmed up yet for the year, she said.

Fourth-year student and Hillel vice-president for finance Adam Spiro said the “environment on campus is the best I’ve seen in three years… I’ve never felt the same vibes; the students are happy. We don’t feel the same tension, but that could change.”

Jewish group extends olive branch to fellow students

The Hall Building was a dramatically different place one year after Sept. 9, 2002, when riot police stormed the lobby and pepper-sprayed protesters occupying the mezzanine and escalator leading to it. Demonstrators outside broke a window and those inside threw chairs and overturned newsstands.

On the anniversary last week, all was normal as students took in orientation activities. The only reminder was at the information table of Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, the student club that was the principal organizer of the anti-Netanyahu protest.

A video of the protest was playing, taken from the perspective of someone who was on the escalator when the police broke up the demonstration. A student manning the table said the video was taken by “a Jewish girl” among the protesters who did not want her name known. She said the video, which was not previously shown, is meant to counter the documentary Confrontation at Concordia, which was aired on Global Television.

Hillel welcomes the moderate, apolitical tone set by the new Concordia Student Union (CSU) executive, but it is not yet ready to drop its legal action against the CSU. However, Spiro characterized the matter as “on the back burner.”

Alley said the dispute with the CSU is “negotiable.”

Hillel is due to return to court Oct. 10 to appeal a Quebec Superior Court judge’s decision to suspend the case and allow the university’s own conflict resolution mechanisms deal with the dispute.

Hillel’s funding from the CSU – amounting to about $3,000 – was frozen last year because Hillel refused to sign an agreement with the CSU that commits clubs to mutual respect and non-violent and non-discriminatory behaviour, and prohibits recruitment for any military or paramilitary organization.”

All 58 CSU-affiliated clubs have signed the agreement.

Hillel’s funding will be withheld this year, too. Spiro said the amount is probably a little more than last year. “But we are able to operate as a club. It’s not stopping us,” he said.

Alley and Spiro said they see no reason for Hillel to sign the document because it is “redundant.” Last November, the the university administration issued an “administrative protocol concerning acceptable public expression,” which is essentially identical to the CSU agreement, except the CSU added a clause about not supporting war.

According to CSU researcher David Bernans, it was later altered to a ban on military recruitment when Hillel’s lawyer Michael Bergman said at a press conference last December that Hillel could not sign the existing agreement because Hillel might want to support a “just” war, such as the war against Iraq.

“For that reason, the statement was changed,” said Bernans. “The vague statement [about not supporting war] was replaced with a more specific one about not doing any recruiting for military or paramilitary organizations. It was not added on to the existing statement, but was a replacement for the sentence that Hillel objected to. In other words, the statement was changed to be more accommodating to Hillel.”

Spiro is not convinced: “They were just [trying] to win a political battle.”

“I’ve kept my weight off for 7 years!”

My name is Marion Chauvin. My weight problem started the way it does for so many women — with pregnancy.

I started trying diets such as shakes and herbal pills. You name the diet, I’d tried it. Dieting was a constant battle. Something had to change.

I found a brochure about hypnosis and weight loss. I realized I had a lot of misconceptions about hypnosis. I went in for a consultation. I melted off 24 pounds and kept my weight off for 7 years!

If your goal is simply to diet, go ahead and try more packaged foods, shakes or pills. Just be prepared to deal with your weight again a few months down the road. If, on the other hand, you want to learn how to change yourself and your life so that food is not an issue, then I urge you to call Positive Changes Hypnosis right away to schedule your free weight loss consultation.” — Marion Chauvin

From Russia With Love to play in Toronto

By SVETLANA BARKAN
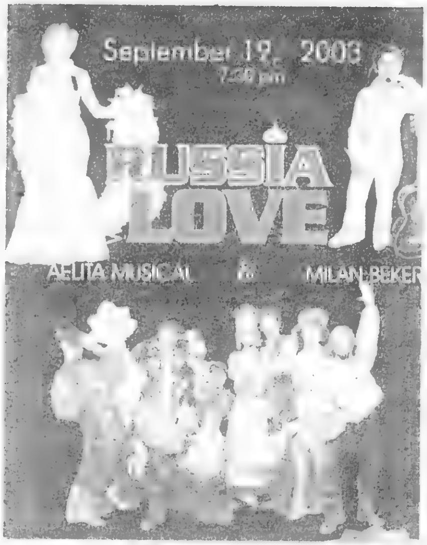
Special to The CJN



From Russia With Love, the internationally acclaimed musical that has been touring the United States for the past eight years, is coming to Toronto for a one-time only performance.

The show, at Leah Posluns Theatre Sept. 19 at 7:30 pm., will be hosted by Aelita and Milan Beker and features many talented performers from the former Soviet Union. Proceeds will go to the Hospital for Sick Children.

Aelita, the woman behind the show and behind Aelita Musical, has been singing for 30 years. Originally from Riga, the capital of Latvia, Aelita has a strong connection with her Jewish roots. Over her career, she has raised more than $7 million for Israel and has performed at many Israeli-related events, such as the Israeli pavilion at Toronto's annual Caravan Festival.

"Before you're going somewhere, you have to know where you came from and you must remember your roots," Aelita says.

A multi-talented performer, Aelita sings in 16 different languages, including Russian, Hebrew, Yiddish, French, Korean, Spanish, Italian and English. In 2002, she performed a song in Korean at the opening of FIFA World Soccer Championship in Seoul.

In From Russia With Love, Aelita sings in seven languages: Russian, Hebrew, Yiddish, French, Italian, Spanish, and, of course, English. The songs Aelita chose for this celebration of music and culture were performed by the true stars of their time: Jewish star Mollie Pikon, French singing sensation Edit Piaf, and American jazz legend Ella Fitzgerald.

Aelita will also perform a medley of traditional Yiddish songs, as well as various songs in Hebrew.

Aelita's young co-star, Milan Beker, began his career in show business when he was only three years old. For the last two years, the eight-year old singing sensation has performed at the Russian Cultural Festival at Mel Lastman Square. He impressed Elvis Presley impersonator Al Ross so much that Ross agreed to perform with Milan in From Russia With Love.

Besides his duet with Ross, Milan will be performing a Hebrew song with Aelita, as well as seven other songs solo.

The concert will also feature Igor Emelianov, a classical Russian baritone, and Beatrice Carpino, an Italian soprano.

Carpino, the daughter of the famous Chef Pasquale, the "singing chef," met Emelianov while performing at a concert together. The two tied the knot last month, and perform a duet in Italian in From Russia With Love.

In addition, Emelianov will also perform various arias and Russian folk songs.

All Russian celebrations include dancing, and From Russia With Love is no exception. The concert will feature the acclaimed six-member Virsky Ukrainian Dance Group, as well as a special dance program by 20-year-old ballroom dancers Sharon Levit and Katya Troubina. The couple has competed in numerous international ballroom competitions, and have been praised by many international judges.

Besides From Russia With Love, Aelita Musical Enterprises offers 56 productions in 15 languages. Aelita personally performs in more than 20 of these shows, including The Best of Broadway, Around the World in 90 Minutes, Native Canadian Dancers and Kensington Market. The company unveiled its new production of From Russia With Love at Donald Trump's Taj Mahal Casino in Atlantic City in 1995.

From Russia With Love is a show in the best tradition of Russian entertainment. For tickets and more information, call 416-256-4896. For more information on Aelita Musical, visit www.aelitamusic.com.

Killing Arafat is not gov't policy, Shalom says

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel has not adopted a formal decision to kill Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said Monday in an apparent attempt to soften remarks made by Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that "killing [Arafat] is definitely one of the options" under consideration by the Israeli government.

"We are trying to eliminate all the heads of terror, and Arafat is one of the heads of terror," Olmert told Israel Radio on Sunday.

"In my eyes, from a moral point of view, this is no different from killing others who were involved in… acts of terror. It's only a practical question. What is the benefit? What will the reaction be? What circumstances will allow this?"

Shalom on Monday contradicted Olmert's earlier statements.

"It [killing Arafat] is not the official policy of the Israeli government. It was never before, and we don't speak about any killing. We didn't speak about it before, and we don't speak about it today," Shalom told reporters Monday.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair's government urged Middle East leaders on Monday to "exercise restraint" and said Israel's suggestion it was considering killing Arafat could damage the peace process.

"We have to recognize that raising the rhetoric is not necessarily a helpful way" of forwarding the road map peace plan, Blair's official spokesperson said in response to journalists' questions.

"It is important that everyone exercises restraint and everyone focuses on how we can achieve the solution that everybody wants," he added, in response to Olmert's comment Sunday.

European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana said Monday he could not imagine Israel would try to kill Arafat, but acknowledged he'd received no guarantees the Palestinian leader would not be targeted for assassination.

Security Council meeting is a 'black mark'

Solana said the Israeli government has been informed by "public and private channels" of international opposition to any attempt on Arafat's life.

He said Olmert's comments had inflamed an already "dramatic" Mideast situation. "Statements of that nature do not contribute to an atmosphere [where] we can see progress move forward," Solana said.

His comments echo those made Sunday by U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell, who said Israel would incite rage not only among Arabs, but Muslims in general by exiling or executing Arafat.

Russia's Deputy Foreign Minister Yuri Fedotov said Monday any attempt to remove Arafat would be counterproductive and could lead to a serious global crisis in the Mideast.

Fedotov said an attempt to kill Arafat could lead to "an immense and wide-scale growth in the threat of terrorism."

He said it would be a "very good idea" if the UN Security Council – which was to begin its 58th session Tuesday – adopted a resolution that made the U.S.-backed road map binding for all sides in the conflict.

Making the plan obligatory, as opposed to being merely recommendations, would help "get back onto the path toward the understanding that was attained before," Fedotov said.

Meanwhile, the UN Security Council was set to vote Monday on a resolution, drafted by Arab states with the support of non-aligned nations, to forbid Israel from deporting Arafat from the disputed territories.

The United States was expected to abstain, according to Israeli and other diplomatic sources in New York, who said the resolution was moderate and restrained, and includes nothing the Americans "cannot live with."

Israel's ambassador to the United Nations on Monday accused the Security Council of hypocrisy for considering the resolution. Dan Gillerman, said the Security Council has met repeatedly to condemn Israeli actions, but ignores Palestinian suicide bombings and shooting attacks on Israelis.

"The fact that the Security Council remembers to meet because of a decision to expel a person, who in everyone's opinion is a murderer and responsible for the wave of terrorism, and possibly for the worst terrorism in the 21st century, is a black mark," Gillerman said.

The Arab League was set to meet ahead of the vote in Cairo to formulate a unified position on Israel's decision to "remove" Arafat.

The resolution includes a clause saying, "the Council demands that Israel, the occupying power, immediately cease deportation steps and halt all threats against the elected president of the Palestinian Authority."

The resolution does not mention Arafat by name, but another clause emphasizes that the president of the PA is chosen democratically and his deportation is thus forbidden.

Security increased in Morocco after Jews killed

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Security is being beefed up at Jewish institutions in Morocco after two Jews were murdered in the kingdom in separate incidents.

Eli Affriat, 75, was stabbed to death in the stomach as he was leaving his home for morning prayers at a synagogue in the northern city of Meknes, about 140 kilometres east of the capital Rabat, on Saturday

Two days earlier, Albert Rebibo, 55, was shot dead in Casablanca.

While police have not ruled out criminal motives in the killings, terrorism is seen as more likely, especially in light of the multiple bombings in Casablanca on May 16 that targeted Jewish sites and killed more than 40 people.

The murders came less than two weeks after Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom visited Morocco amid reports the two countries are considering re-establishing closer diplomatic ties.

Morocco played a behind-the-scenes role in contacts between Israel and the Palestinians during the 1990s, but reduced those contacts during the past three years of the Palestinian intifadah.

The Rebibo shooting also came on the second anniversary of the Sept. 11 terror attacks in New York and Washington, D.C., and during the shooting his killers reportedly shouted "God is great" in Arabic.

Robert Asraf, a leader of Morocco's Jewish community, told Ha'aretz that senior police officials told him Rebibo was murdered by members of Al Qaeda from outside Morocco.

During Rebibo's funeral, Serge Bardugo, secretary-general of the Moroccan Jewish community, told hundreds of mourners that the timing of the shooting – at 12:45 GMT, the exact moment the first of New York's World Trade Centre towers was hit in 2001 – pointed to a terrorist attack.

Rebibo was a lumber merchant who was closing down the shutters of his store for lunch when two individuals arrived on motorcycles and shot him, sources in the community told U.S.-based Jewish groups.

Moroccan police set up roadblocks and dispatched helicopters in an attempt to find the killers, but they were unsuccessful.

After the shooting, Moroccan King Mohammed VI phoned Jewish community leaders, pledging to protect the community and take steps to find the killers.

The community numbers about 5,000 today, down from about 250,000 in 1948. Most of Morocco's Jews are older than 50. Communities in Fez, Rabat and Marrakech, all of which once boasted thousands of Jews living intimately in walled medieval markets, now have only a few hundred members.

Despite this, the king and Moroccan Jewish leaders are proud of the country's Jewish heritage, and after the May attacks, the king pledged to rebuild the damaged buildings.

The second deadly attack occurred after the king had already spoken to community leaders.

Since Affriat was a fortune teller and a money lender, police are investigating the possibility that his murder was criminally, not politically, motivated.

The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, which helps support the Moroccan Jewish community, is "working with the community to take whatever steps are necessary" to maintain Moroccan Jewish life, said JDC's executive vice-president, Steven Schwager.

Bardugo said a sense of helplessness has engulfed the community.

"The authorities are willing to do anything we ask, but we have nothing to ask," he said.

"All Jewish institutions are already guarded, and a policeman cannot be attached to every Jew. But in Israel the situation is no better, and in France there is no work. All that remains is to be afraid."

A dead-end move

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

With one decision, the Israeli cabinet has succeeded in resurrecting Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, whose importance appeared to be declining both internationally and in the Arab world.

The cabinet's declaration of its intention to deport or kill Arafat raises serious doubts as to its capability to handle the acute, bloody crisis with the Palestinians adequately.

This is not the first time that this government, headed by Sharon, has resurrected the declining Arafat, who is imprisoned and besieged in his West Bank office in Ramallah, the Muqata. The last time the siege was tightened and Israeli tanks threatened to storm the Muqata, Arafat managed to attract renewed international attention and got Saudi King Fahd to ask U.S. President George W. Bush to prevent the tanks' entrance. The Israel Defence Forces (IDF) decided then not to make the same mistake twice. But the politicians thought otherwise.

Due to the absence of a political plan and the difficulty of finding satisfactory answers to terror, the Israeli leadership's anger, desire for revenge and frustration are dictating decisions, such as the one made last weekend.

This is one of the strangest "war" decisions ever made by the Israeli cabinet. Usually, decisions regarding military action are made in secret and then carried out. Here the opposite has happened. Israel has declared its intention, prompting Washington and the international community to come out against it. The IDF did not need a cabinet decision to start planning a deportation order. It probably has had a drawerful of expulsion plans for some time.

The move raises the question of whether Sharon merely wanted to prove to the radical right-wing ministers that their old proposal to remove Arafat would elicit American objections, and therefore they had better withdraw the suggestion. But the issue snowballed and became an international and American problem for Israel even before the expulsion has been carried out.

The first step was Israel's announcement to U.S. Ambassador Dan Kurtzer that Sharon's bureau chief, Dov Weisglass, intended to discuss in Washington the possibility of deporting Arafat. Even before Weisglass left for Washington, Kurtzer said Washington objects to deportation. But despite this, Weisglass brought it up in Washington. That means Sharon wanted to hear another "no" from the Americans in Washington, not only from Kurtzer.

This time it was U.S. National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice herself who said "no" to Israel. On the face of it, this was enough to persuade Israel's Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz and other right-wing ministers that it was not advisable to act against Washington's wishes. Indeed, the subject was not raised in the cabinet until the two attacks by Hamas last week.

With the cabinet's decision, Israel maneuvred itself into a dead end. If it expels Arafat, it will enter into confrontation with international bodies and governments, without Washington's backing this time. If it withdraws from its declared intention, its prestige will suffer and it will be considered subject to Washington's whims. If it deports Arafat and he is harmed in the process, a situation will arise, as one Israeli political leader said, "We don't need another Jesus, for whose death the Jews will be blamed."

On a practical level, if Israel deports Arafat, Palestinian leaders might not be able to conduct independent negotiations with Israel. Would Abu Ala, for example, proceed with the peace process while the deported Arafat, who has become the embodiment of the Palestinian people, vetoes from afar every Palestinian step he doesn't approve?

IAEA to debate Israel's nuclear program

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

VIENNA — The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) was set to discuss Israel's nuclear program during its general conference this week, reports said.

A debate on the atomic weapons Israel is believed to possess was on the agenda along with the atomic power of Iran, Iraq and North Korea.

Observers said they expected heated altercations among the136-member-states of the IAEA. Arab states have frequently complained that the IAEA has been silent so far about Israel.

Important decisions are not expected at the general conference, as they are usually made in the IAEA Council of Governors which met last week.

Last Friday the Council of Governors set a deadline for Iran to give detailed information about its controversial nuclear program by the end of October. The demand prompted a walkout by the Iranian delegation from the conference chamber.

A majority of the 35 states on the council were reportedly in favour of setting the deadline. The United States in particular claims Iran is building nuclear weapons.

The Iranians deny this and say their nuclear program is entirely for peaceful purposes. Teheran had warned against an excessively tough resolution by the IAEA.

The resolution, supported by the United States, Australia, Canada and Japan, among others, called on Teheran to give IAEA inspectors access to all its nuclear installations and reveal all its imports of nuclear technology and nuclear scientific experiments.

The draft further said Iran should sign a supplementary protocol to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty allowing IAEA inspectors access to installations without prior notice. Finally, Iran was called on to refrain from any uranium enriching processes.

Israel calls EU move to ban Hamas 'very helpful'

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel last week welcomed a move by the European Union (EU) to increase pressure on Hamas by adding the entire organization to its list of terrorist groups, calling the move "very, very helpful" in saving Middle East peace efforts.

"As long as Hamas has the ability of terror activity, it means the peace process will never be able to get off the ground," senior Foreign Ministry official, Gideon Meir, said by telephone during a visit to Germany.

Meir didn't have specifics on how much funding would be blocked, but said, "The principle is important here."

But the EU appeared to stop short of a U.S.-style crackdown on European-based charities that allegedly funnel money to the Islamic terror group.

Five days after EU foreign ministers – reacting to the suicide bus bombing in Jerusalem on Aug. 19 that killed 22 people – agreed to add political offshoots of Hamas to the terrorist blacklist, ambassadors in Brussels reached preliminary agreement on implementing the decision, diplomats said.

Until now, the EU had blacklisted only Hamas' military wing, which has claimed responsibility for numerous attacks, including two last week that killed 15 people.

Diplomats and EU officials said the new list, which still needs final approval from ministers before it becomes official, probably Saturday, was in line with the foreign ministers' decision, but remained vague.

"There is no specific mention of names or other organizations," an EU diplomat said on condition of anonymity. "It is 'Hamas' as such."

That could make it difficult for authorities to freeze funds of allegedly affiliated groups or individuals.

On Aug. 22, three days after the Jerusalem bombing, the Bush administration froze the U.S. assets of six senior Hamas leaders and five European-based organizations it says raise money for the extremist Palestinian group, and called on others to do the same in the wake of the Jerusalem bombing, which launched a new round of violence. The EU diplomat said the issue of freezing assets remained on the agenda and would be studied more in depth.

France in particular had led opposition to blacklisting all of Hamas, wary of cutting off avenues of negotiation or hurting the group's extensive social services network, including health and education. There was no immediate comment from French officials.

Last week on Monday, the EU head office, which administers aid, said it would not be able to make up any services that lose funding because of the blacklist, adding that would be up to President Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority.

Later in the week, the EU again demanded that the Palestinian Authority crack down on terror, following last Tuesday's suicide bombings outside a military base near Rishon Letzion and at a Jerusalem cafe. Fifteen people were killed in the two attacks.

"The European Union wishes to reaffirm its strongest condemnation of these two terrorist attacks as well as the organizations that planned and executed them," the EU presidency said in a statement on behalf of the 15 governments.

It warned that the "resurgence of terrorist attacks is claiming an intolerable toll of innocent Israeli citizens, it is obstructing the efforts of the international community to restore peace in the region and it is damaging the interests of the cause of the Palestinian people."

The statement said the EU "strongly urges the Palestinian Authority to take all necessary concrete measures against those terrorist organizations that are opposed to any political dialogue and undermine all the efforts to restore hope and to bring peace, security and better conditions of life to the region."

Survey shows mixed picture of American Jewry

By JOE BERKOFSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The Jewish population is aging and shrinking, its birthrate is falling, intermarriage is rising and most Jews do not engage in communal or religious pursuits.

Yet a majority attend a Passover seder and celebrate Chanukah, Jewish education is booming, and many Jews consider being Jewish important and have strong ties to Israel.

These are not duelling headlines, but parallel portraits contained in the long-awaited National Jewish Population Survey (NJPS) 2000-01.

Federations and Jewish communal leaders use these studies every decade for policy and planning decisions.

The United Jewish Communities (UJC), the federation umbrella group, officially released the $6 million (US) study last week, nearly a year after retracting initial NJPS data and delaying the survey's release amid controversy over its methodology and missing data.

A subsequent internal audit led to an independent review that UJC officials said was to be made public late last week.

But they and others said the study paints the most comprehensive, reliable picture of American Jewry to date.

Not only did the reviews reinforce the data's validity, but the NJPS was compared to other communal studies and "our numbers checked out very nicely," said Lorraine Blass, NJPS project director and senior planner at UJC.

Those numbers add up to a complex Jewish continuum.

On one end lies a small segment of the community experiencing a Jewish renaissance, and on the other is a majority that continues to assimilate.

In the vast middle remain most Jews who engage in few Jewish pursuits.

"The big story is how the affiliated and the unaffiliated sharply differ on all measures of Jewish life," said Steven M. Cohen, a senior NJPS consultant and Hebrew University professor.

"As a group, American Jews may be moving in two different directions simultaneously: increasing Jewish intensification alongside decreasing Jewish intensity. It may well be the most and least involved are gaining at the expense of those with middling levels of Jewish involvement."

Among the study's key findings:

- There are 5.2 million U.S. Jews, down five per cent from 5.5 million counted in the 1990 population study.
- Of those, 4.3 million have "stronger Jewish connections," meaning they attend Passover seders and light Chanukah candles. This number also includes those more Jewishly committed – people who keep kosher homes, routinely attend synagogue, attend Jewish schools and belong to at least one Jewish organization.
- Intermarriage is rising at a steady pace, at 47 per cent for the past five years. That represents a four per cent increase from 1990, which was calculated differently. Of all Jews currently wed, one-third are intermarried.
- Day school enrollment is rising, with 29 per cent of youths ages six-17 saying they have attended day schools or yeshivas.
- An estimated 353,000 people, including 272,000 adults and 81,000 children, live in households with incomes below the poverty line.
- The median Jewish age is 42, compared to 35 for Americans generally, and the birthrate was 1.8, below the 1.9 rate for American women generally.

While many of these figures did not change sharply from the last NJPS in 1990, some warned of troubling signs for the coming decade.

There was a drop in the population of Jewish children, especially in the zero-four age bracket, and though the initial report did not contain the exact figure, it said 20 per cent of the overall population were children, down one per cent from a decade ago.

The NJPS survey also indicated that intermarriage stayed at the same rate of 43 per cent between 1985 and 1990 and between 1991 and 1996, then climbed to 47 per cent through 2001.

But David Marker, a member of the advisory committee that consulted on the NJPS and a senior statistician at Westat, a statistics firm, said, "Intermarriage doesn't have to be viewed as a negative.

"The Jewish community needs to do a better job of reaching out to the families of the intermarried, making them feel wanted and comfortable in Jewish institutions without pushing them away."

Beyond the debate over intermarriage that began after the 1990 study, Cohen and others said the growing gap between active and inactive Jews remained a big hurdle for organizations such as Jewish community centres, synagogues and other institutions seeking to gain members.

According to the NJPS, among the more connected 4.3 million Jews, 44 per cent did not belong to any Jewish group, 28 per cent were "moderately affiliated" to one group, and 28 per cent were "highly affiliated" with two or more.

Among those Jews belonging to one or more Jewish organizations, Jewish religious and communal ties grew while dropping sharply among the unaffiliated.

Among the more active Jews, there were some surprises when it came to education.

Day school enrollment is rising, with 29 per cent of youth ages six to 17 saying they have attended day schools or yeshivas, and 23 per cent of those ages 18-34 saying they have attended such schools.

At the same time, 41 per cent of college and graduate students said they had taken a Jewish studies course.

Arafat must be ousted: Sharansky

"We know from intelligence information who has been planning the attacks," said Sharansky, who was due to deliver speeches at York University, the University of Toronto and Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Arafat has "prevented" the dismantling of the Palestinians' terrorist infrastructure in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and helped Palestinian rejectionists strengthen themselves during the short lived hudna, or temporary ceasefire, he charged.

"Arafat is a guarantor of Hamas and a huge obstacle to peace," Sharansky said.

Asked whether the Palestinian leader should be marked for death, as Deputy Minister Ehud Olmert was reported to have said last week, Sharansky replied, "It's not a topic for discussion. It's for [Israeli] intelligence officials to decide."

Sharansky suggested that Arafat's popularity among the Palestinians is superficial. He compared it with Joseph Stalin's so-called popularity in the Soviet Union prior to his death.

He said Arafat has no interest in improving the lives of his people, but in perpetuating the conflict. When he was minister of industry and trade between 1996 and 1999, Sharansky recalled, he forwarded proposals to Arafat to ameliorate the living conditions of Palestinians in the Palestinian autonomous areas, but "[h]e was not interested."

Israel wants to work with a Palestinian leadership that will not hesitate to fight terrorism, Sharansky said. He cast doubt on the ability of the new Palestinian prime minister, Ahmed Quriea, to act independently of Arafat.

Israel should not enter into discussions about Palestinian statehood until there is a Palestinian leadership ready and able to combat terrorism, he said, adding that Israel cannot support the creation of a Palestinian state "whose aim is to destroy us."

He said, "We want to give the Palestinians all rights, except the right to destroy us."

According to Sharansky, talks about a Palestinian state should be held in abeyance until a new Palestinian leadership emerges and genuine democratic reforms are implemented.

"I can see a Palestinian state at the end of that process."

He said the road map peace plan is flawed because these pre-conditions were not placed at the top of the agenda, as U.S. President George W. Bush promised in his June 2002 speech. "I always saw problems in it," he observed, referring to the road map.

Asked whether Israel is poised to invade the Gaza Strip, Hamas' stronghold, Sharansky replied, "Israel has an obligation to give its people guarantees of security. Hamas is killing our people in cafés and public places. We have to bring Hamas to justice. There is no place in the world Hamas can hide, and no person in Hamas has immunity."

An invasion, he said, is a matter for the army.

Sharansky was also asked why some 18,000 Falash Mura, comprising of Ethiopian Jews whose ancestors converted to Christianity under duress, have still not been airlifted to Israel for resettlement. Israel's ministry of interior has not implemented a cabinet decision taken last winter to bring them to Israel.

He said the delay is due to two factors.

Israel must check whether they are eligible to make aliyah under the Law of Return, and funds must be found to finance their integration into Israeli society.

"It's untrue they're not being brought to Israel because they're blacks," he said agitatedly.

The accusation that Israel prefers white immigrants is not only insulting but anti-Semitic, Sharansky said.

Israel, he said, is the only country in the world today bringing immigrants from Africa to its shores.

Sharansky said that $1 billion (US) – which includes funds for special medical and educational needs – is needed to settle the Falash Mura.

He appealed to North American Jewish communities to raise funds for this purpose.

Sharansky said he visited the Falash Mura in Ethiopia when he was minister of interior. "I saw their suffering, and their situation was awful."

The Israeli government, he said, has decided in principle to bring them to Israel.

Nir Bergman's Broken Wings deliberately avoids politics

Director's first feature film is autobiographical

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Nir Bergman's celebrated film, Broken Wings, which won nine prizes at last year's Israeli Academy Awards, avoids the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Bergman, 34, deliberately stayed clear of Middle Eastern politics, but he can understand why foreign viewers might have expected even an indirect nod to the perennial dispute that so consumes Israelis.

The average Israeli really has no interest in watching a movie about that explosive topic, he said last week during a round of interviews to promote Broken Wings, his first feature film, at the Toronto International Film Festival.

"We live the conflict every day of our lives. We grow up with it. We deal with it."

Born in Haifa and now living in Tel Aviv, Bergman explained that Broken Wings lets viewers see "the real Israel."

Broken Wings, which was Israel's official submission in the foreign language Academy Award category, is about a bereaved middle-class family trying to come to terms with a husband's and a father's sudden, untimely death.

"I was obliged to tell this story," said Bergman, a quiet, self-effacing man who is the antithesis of Hollywood glamour. "It's personal."

In the film, the Ullmans – Dafna, Maya, Yair, Ido and Bahr – are still in a state of mourning, deeply affected by the passing of a man who meant so much to them.

Nir Bergman on the set of the movie Broken Wings.

Dafna, the mother, can hardly function. Maya, her eldest daughter, must defer ambitious plans. Yair has dropped out of school and has abandoned his dreams of being a professional basketball player. Ido is suicidal. Bahr, the youngest, feels neglected.

Bergman knows all about loss. In this sense, he acknowledged, Broken Wings is autobiographical.

"I lost my father at the age of 10 in a horrible divorce," he disclosed. "He left us, my mother, sister and I, with terrible financial problems."

As a result, Bergman's sister was sent to a kibbutz. "She couldn't handle it. I was like Maya. I had to be OK all the time, to keep the family together."

Bergman, who made Broken Wings for around $600,000 (US), a hefty sum by Israeli film industry standards, was not too surprised by its commercial success in Israel.

"People could identify with its characters and truths," he said. "It brought parents and their children together at theatres, which is the most wonderful thing."

He worked on it for four years, though shooting lasted only 26 days. Its hard, grey look was deliberate, reflecting the enveloping crisis gripping the Ullmans in their hour of duress.

Broken Wings, which is scheduled to open in Toronto in March or April of 2004, has given his career an immeasurable boost. "It's easier to raise funds for new films, but it has heightened expectations, which is not good."

Currently, Bergman, the father of twins born in April, is finishing the script for his next film, tentatively titled Frou Frou, a drama set during the 1982 war in Lebanon. He hopes to begin filming next March in Haifa and Ein Hod, an artist's village in the foothills of the Carmel mountain range.

Bergman studied cinema at Tel Aviv University and the Sam Spiegel Film and Television School in Jerusalem after completing his national service.

He did not much like the army. "Three disgusting years. It's a dictatorship. Some kid a year older than you giving you orders."

Bergman's first film, a short called Sea Horses, recounted his parents' bitter breakup. It won 10 prizes at various international film festivals.

His second film, The Class Queen, was a documentary about the "hardships of popularity." It was followed by Reaching for Heaven, which tells the story of a secular Jew who embraces religion.

Although his films studiously avoid the Arab-Israeli dispute, Bergman keeps up with the latest developments in the Mideast. And he is not an optimist. As he bluntly put it: "A few powerful people in this region don't want peace."

TORONTO PLAYWRIGHT GARFINKEL 'FASCINATED' BY DEMJANJUK TRIALS

Toronto poet-playwright Jonathan Garfinkel, who recently turned 30, claims he's too young to remember much about the first trial of John Demjanjuk that began in Israel in 1987, in which the man accused of being Ivan the Terrible of Treblinka was ultimately acquitted.

However, he says he was fascinated when the Demjanjuk case came up again in the United States in 1999 – so fascinated, in fact, that he wrote a Brechtian-style "Holocaust cabaret" about the affair, in collaboration with Toronto composer Allen Cole.

The result, The Trials of John Demjanjuk, has been workshopped at the Ashkenaz festival and at the National Arts Centre in Ottawa, where a public performance was given. Theatre Asylum recently announced that it intends to produce the play in Toronto in the spring.

A play about John Demjanjuk may be produced by Theatre Asylum.

"Like [Bertolt] Brecht did in his theatre, I want to present the facts to the audience so they can make up their minds about the subject," Garfinkel said. "At the same time, I'm playing with the accusation that some people made that the Demjanjuk trial was a show trial. I'm not saying it was, but I'm playing with that idea."

The play has also been selected for inclusion in the anthology, A Terrible Trial: Plays of the Holocaust, which Playwrights Canada Press is slated to publish in November to coincide with Holocaust Education Week. Garfinkel is to give a public reading at a Toronto venue on Nov. 9.

A public reading of another Holocaust-related play is scheduled for this week. Sara's Cave, an award-winning new play by Don Molnar, focuses on a woman who hides a Jewish family in her root cellar during the German occupation of Poland. Between Stages presents a staged reading followed by a discussion with the author. Suggested donation $5 or PWYC. Miles Nadal JCC, Bloor and Spadina. Thursday, Sept. 25, 7:30 p.m.

Rasky Focuses on Jewish Toronto: Nobody Swings on Sunday, a new documentary by veteran filmmaker Harry Rasky, depicts the experiences of the Rasky and other Jewish families in Toronto during the '20s and '30s, and evokes a strong sense of the Jewish communal life and the poverty and discrimination that marked the era.

The film takes in homes, stores, synagogues, Hebrew schools and movie theatres as it tours the neighbourhood where the Rasky family settled with their eight children. Interview subjects include broadcaster Patrick Watson, entertainer Don Harron, painter Aba Bayefsky, musician Eugene Kash and even ballet giant Mikhail Baryshnikov, who talks about defecting in Canada. Nobody Swings on Sunday airs CBC television on Sept. 25 at 7 p.m.

Names in the News: Dancer Avinoam Silverman debuts in The Firebird, a National Ballet of Canada production touring Western Canada this month… Musical artists David Wall and Marilyn Lerner perform at Apples & Honey, the Winchevsky Centre's secular celebration of Rosh Hashanah on Sept. 27… Artist Katherine Dolgy Ludwig recently returned to Toronto after a year of study in London, during which she mounted a large solo show at the West London Synagogue. Many of her London paintings are on view at the Holy Blossom Temple until Oct. 30… Sean Cullen plays Max Bialystock and Michael Therriault plays Leo Bloom in the upcoming production of the Mel Brooks musical The Producers. Performances begin Nov. 21 at the Canon Theatre on Yonge St.

The Faces of Israel on exhibit at the Koffler Centre

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Sid Shoub has been taking pictures since he was 13 years old. He'll be 80 next month and over the years his award winning photographs have appeared in travel magazines and exhibitions.

The Faces of Israel is a collection of photographs that Shoub started taking during a visit to Israel in 1971. The display, now being shown in the Loggia at the Koffler Centre for the Arts in Toronto is divided thematically. Among the various groups portrayed are pictures of soldiers in the Israel Defence Forces; Orthodox residents of Me'a Shearim and Arab shopkeepers in the Old City.

A kabob vendor and his daughter. Part of Sid Shoub's exhibitiion.

Shoub's pictures of ordinary people – the falafel maker in Safed, the Tel Aviv vegetable peddler, the gold toothed waiter in Tiberias – attempt to capture moods and characterizations of individuals.

Shoub was born in Montreal and moved to Toronto in 1969 where he worked as an investment broker. However, he never stopped travelling and taking pictures, always asking permission before clicking.

And while many of the faces in the photos are smiling, "underneath the smile I was hoping to reveal the determination and warmth of a people," Shoub said.

The show, which is being presented under the auspices of the Israeli Consul General and Temple Emanu-El, will be on display until Oct. 17 at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC).

Migrant worker inspires award-winning film

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Tens of thousands of foreign workers have poured into Israel in the last decade, performing the menial, low-paying jobs Israelis usually eschew.

Ra'anan Alexandrowicz's quirky film, James' Journey to Jerusalem, which premiered at this year's Jerusalem Film Festival and opens in Israeli theatres in December, examines this phenomenon, albeit with a slight twist.

James, a Nigerian farmer and evangelical Christian who aspires to be a pastor, is a latter-day pilgrim. He travels to Israel on behalf of his village to visit the Jerusalem of their dreams.

But no sooner does he set foot in Israel than he is arrested. He is suspected of being an illegal foreign worker.

Rescued from the drudgery of prison by a canny Jewish manpower agent, James is summarily put to work as a common labourer. James makes the best of his situation, but as his illusions about Israel fade away, his dream of visiting Jerusalem recedes.

James' Journey to Jerusalem, which was screened at the 27th Toronto International Film Festival, was inspired by his chance encounter several years ago with a Nigerian man named James residing in Israel on a long-expired tourist visa.

In Nigeria, he had been a banker. But in Tel Aviv, he cleaned houses, said Alexandrowicz, who was born and raised in Jerusalem but who now lives in Tel Aviv.

"James shared with me the hardships, fears and sorrows of a migrant worker's life, as well as his memories of Nigeria, and his dream of reaching Canada."

James told Alexandrowicz he had imagined Israel as a green, bountiful land flowing with milk and honey, as described in the scriptures, and had thought "the Lord's chosen people" dwelled in Israel.

James' ruminations amazed Alexandrowicz. "When I heard these words, I realized I was hearing the opening scene of a film. The contradictions and irony I felt in in these few sentences expressed by a person who was living in the most rundown part of Tel Aviy, a man who earned his livelihood cleaning bathrooms and kitchens, led me to start writing James' Journey to Jerusalem."

When Alexandrowicz, 34, began composing the script four years ago, Israeli cinema had yet to deal with the topic of foreign workers. But by the time he finished it, two Israeli films on the subject had already been released.

Alexandrowicz, who characterizes his 87-minute movie as "a contemporary economic fairy tale with realistic elements," explained it is not strictly about foreign workers.

"It's very much about what money does to a person's behaviour and to a society. James starts with a dream, going to Jerusalem, and ends up buying a new television. Money is a very powerful thing and just transforms people."

James' Journey to Jerusalem, he also noted, charts the profound impact of economic change on Israeli society.

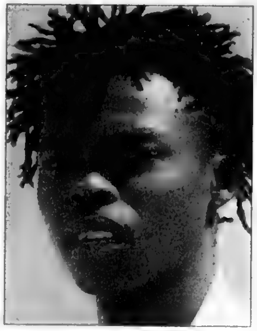
"As Israel's economy develops, the more its soul deteriorates and the harsher it becomes," said Alexandrowicz, who claims that foreign workers are generally exploited by Israeli employers.

"They're paid minimum wages, with no social benefits. That's the way a modern economy works, whether in Israel or somewhere else."

And James, he added, serves as a telling metaphor for the evolving nature of Zionism. As he learns the tricks of the game, he becomes increasingly cynical and materialistic and defers his trip to Jerusalem, the raison d'etre of his pilgrimage to Israel.

So it is with Zionism, he said. The early Zionist pioneers who settled the land were animated by a purity of objectives. But today, these ideas seem saccharin and outdated.

"Soul is one of our assets," he observed. "We should be careful with it, but we're not."



Siyabonga Meongisi Shibe

James' Journey to Jerusalem, the first Israeli film where Zulu is spoken, was shot over a two year period, mainly in the working-class Tel Aviv neighbourhood of Kfar Shalem. It cost just under $500,000 (US). "We started shooting before all the funds were raised," said Alexandrowicz, who studied cinema at the Sam Spiegel Film and Television School in Jerusalem.

To cast James, he went to South Africa, whree he hired a young actor, Siyabonga Melongisi Shibe, for the part. His stellar performance earned him the best actor award at the Jerusalem Film Festival.

Before making James' Journey to Jerusalem, Alexandrowicz, a former paratrooper, made The Inner Journey, a documentary about Palestinan refugees who pay a sentimental visit to their former homes in Israel. "Getting to know Israel through their eyes was an important experience for me," he said.

In his view, Israelis and Palestinians can coexist. "We are two very compatible nations, but the politics are very dangerous."

Alexandrowicz is currently completing a small documentary about Hand in Hand, a progressive school in Jerusalem's Katamon district where the languages of instruction are Hebrew and Arabic.

Hospital says it was within law to ask for payment

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The director-general of the Centre Hospitalier Laurentien denies that staff acted improperly in their handling of a chassidic boy with appendicitis who arrived at the hospital's emergency ward without his medicare card or proof of identity.

On Aug. 16, a Saturday, Shalom Lison, 13, was brought by ambulance to the hospital in Ste. Agathe des Monts with abdominal pains. He was accompanied by his father Yomtov Lison and family friend Yehudah Gniwisch. The Lison family, Lubavitchers who live in Montreal, were spending the weekend at their home near Ste. Agathe.

Rochel Lison, the boy's mother, told The CJN they had left the medicare card in Montreal.

The boy woke up Saturday with a stomach ache that got worse through the day. Around 5 p.m., they called an ambulance.

Because it was Shabbat, neither the father nor Gniwisch was carrying a wallet and therefore could not provide the required ID or pay the $700 demanded by the registration clerk. Lison said she and her husband are Canadians.

Gniwisch, who speaks French, attempted to explain to the clerk that once Shabbat was over, within about two hours, they would either have a family member drive up from Montreal with the card or pay the $700.

"She was not interested in our explanation. It was just pay the money or we won't treat the child," said Gniwisch. He and the mother said no doctor even looked at the boy, who had been transferred from the ambulance to a bed in emergency.

Gniwisch said another woman came over, whom he presumed to be a supervisor, and made a remark he and Yomtov Lison considered to be anti-Semitic.

"She said in French, something to the effect that too many of us have stiffed the hospital."

Rochel Lison said her husband also felt he was being treated with hostility because he is a visibly Orthodox Jew.

"The tone was: pay the money right now or we won't see your son," she said.

Frustrated and with Shalom in terrible pain, Yomtov Lison left the hospital and drove the boy to the Montreal Children's Hospital, where he subsequently underwent surgery. He has since recovered.

Jocelyne Thifault, a spokesperson for the Centre Hospitalier Laurentien, told The CJN that an investigation was conducted and there was no basis for the family's complaint.

Director-general Jacques Gaudette has issued a written clarification. After checking with the staff on duty that day, he said the boy was given a "clinical evaluation" while an "unidentified adult" went to the reception to fill out an admission form.

"This adult did not have a medicare card or any proof of identity in his possession that would permit determination of Canadian citizenship.

"In such a case, the policy in force in all Quebec hospitals is to demand a sum of money for possible treatment, payable by cheque, credit card or cash. An amount of $700 was asked of the adult who, without giving an explanation, then left the emergency with the adolescent."

Gaudette stressed that "no inelegant remark was made to the adult or the adolescent" and that no complaint has been lodged.

He wrote that the hospital maintains "excellent relations" with the community it serves, regardless of ethnic origin. It also serves tourists of all nationalities, he said.

Rochel Lison said she called the Laurentian regional health board and was told to write a letter of complaint, but said she must wait until she finds someone to do it in proper French.

"I never thought something like this would happen in Canada. Our main concern now is that this should not happen to somebody else."

She has used the services of the hospital before without any problems, but only when she had her medicare card with her.

Gniwisch said he does not understand why the hospital could not have shown some flexibility. "They had the names and address of the parents. It would have been easy to find out if it was legitimate."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. There has recently been a lot of publicity about the growing number of obese children and their poor eating habits. How much junk food is OK for young kids?

A. I believe that here less is more. Kids need fat in their diet, but it does not have to be excessive, nor should it be artery-clogging fat. As well, if the only foods that you offer your children and expose them to are "kiddy foods," then don't be surprised when that's all they eat. Dinner should not be a steady schedule of chicken fingers, mac and cheese, hot dogs and grilled cheese.

Your children should eat the same dinner as you eat. Offer it and they'll get the picture that this is what dinner looks like (i.e., salmon, broccoli and rice). You may need to make modifications to ease them into this, but it's worth the effort. For young children, you could offer stickers every time they try a new food.

To answer your question specifically, it is OK for kids to have chicken fingers and fries occasionally, or cookies and potato chips (a few times per week, not daily). It is OK for kids to have treats most days, but those treats don't have to be loaded with saturated and trans fat. Read labels carefully, avoid foods containing hydrogenated oils and high amounts of saturated fat and sugar. Limit juice and pop, and stock your house with healthy foods that your kids like.

Q. My kids love homemade chocolate chip cookies, how can I make them healthier?

A. Good for you for baking from scratch. Take your family's favourite recipe and bake it using whole wheat flour and non-hydrogenated margarine as the fat source. You can also add walnuts for an additional heart-healthy kick.

Q. I am trying to cut back on the amount of caffeine that I consume. I am under the impression that tea has almost no caffeine, and wondered if this is true.

A. It depends on the tea. Regular black tea has about one-quarter the caffeine of coffee, green tea has about half that of black tea, white tea (a new tea receiving a lot of attention because of its lack of colour and its antioxidant properties) has about half that of green tea, virtually no caffeine. Many herbal teas are naturally decaffeinated and you can buy decaffeinated black tea.

Q. I have been buying bottled water for our family, but with so many waters on the market, I am confused as to which is really clean and pure. How can I tell?

A. You want to check on the label where it says ppm, which stands for parts per million. Many waters are around 300 ppm. You want to look for one closest to or at 0 ppm. These types of water will be purified by reverse osmosis, distilled or steamed distilled processes.

Spiderman and The Hulk team up for new kids' CDs

By LAUREN KRUGEL
Special to The CJN

As Spiderman says, "With great power comes great responsibility."

This message doesn't only apply to combatting the forces of evil in the big city, but to playing on the playground too.

In the new children's music collections, Spiderman and Friends and Hulk, the Marvel superheroes show kids how to play nice, share, and be a good friend.

"If you've got power you better use it to be good/It don't mean nothin' if you don't do what you should/Just like Spidey does in his neighbourhood, if you've got power better use it to do good," are the lyrics of the upbeat rock song, If you've got power.

Produced, written and performed by Juno award winner Bob Schneider and his partner Hallary Dworet, both longtime children's entertainers, the CDs feature songs geared towards children between two and five.

Schneider, Dworet and Julie Evans sing on the CD along with six children aged nine to 14. All of the artists are from Ontario.

While the songs are "as singable and danceable as possible," Schneider said it was important to incorporate positive messages without being condescending.

"We do it in a way that's more subtle, that kids can relate to," he said.

Each character has his or her own song about what makes them superheroes. For instance, Spider-Girl never fights with her friends; Captain America helps his buddies when they're feeling down; The Incredible Hulk never hesitates to share his toys.

Marvel Comics approached the duo earlier this year and asked them to write and produce original songs to go along with a young children's comic book they had produced, also called Spiderman and Friends. Hulk was produced right after and both were released simultaneously this June.

Working on a very short deadline, Dworet describes the experience as "intense," but said the fact that they were given a focused subject to write about made the creative process easier.

Besides the short deadline, Dworet said it was a challenge to interpret some of the Marvel characters in a child-friendly way. For instance, characters like the Incredible Hulk might be scary to a small child.

Dworet said they used the "elements that are appropriate for kids. It took a lot of creative thought."

The 50s-style rock song, He's Green Green Green is about accepting people who look different. In it Schneider sings, "If you look a little closer, you'll see it's true, though he's green on the outside, on the inside he's a lot like you."

The CDs can be used by teachers too, said Dworet. Repetition, hand actions and dance moves go along with many of the songs. The rap song S-P-I-D-E-R-M-A-N, helps kids learn how to spell.

Unlike the superheros of decades past, there is no lack of female role models on Spiderman and Friends or Hulk. Songs about Spider-Girl and Storm, among others are given as much of the spotlight as their male counterparts.

To order the Spiderman and Friends, call the Canadian distribution office of Turn Up the Music at 514-333-0007.

Jewish rookies try to crack NFL rosters

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Each year a handful of exceptional Jewish college football players manage to be drafted or are invited to National Football League training camps, where they may encounter their "landsmen."

This year is no exception, as rookies Antonio Garay of the Cleveland Browns, Ben Mahdavi and Mike Saffer of the Atlanta Falcons, Mike Seidman of the Carolina Panthers and Adam Goldberg of the Minnesota Vikings vie for spots on NFL rosters.

If these rookies stick with their present teams, they might eventually cross swords with the likes of Jay Fiedler and Sage Rosenfels of the Miami Dolphins, Lennie Friedman of the Washington Redskin, a pair of Vikings in Mike Rosenthal and Hayden Epstein, or Pittsburgh Steeler Josh Miller.

Knowledgeable NFL fans who spend their Sunday afternoons in front of large-screen TVs know that the most notable of the aforementioned athletes is quarterback Jay Fiedler, who is in the second year of a five-year contract.

While the 31-year-old is no Sid Luckman, the Dolphins felt secure in committing themselves to the long-term pact. The Dartmouth grad, who stands 6-2 and weighs 225 lbs, started in 41 of 42 games in his last three seasons with Miami.

A second cousin to the late Arthur Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Pops, he previously had short stints with Minnesota and Jacksonville.

Being from a Reform Jewish family of sports enthusiasts, Jay's mother Donna and father Ken, a high school basketball coach for 30 years, were always supportive of their sons Jay and brother Scott, who is also a basketball coach.

Jay may not have great arm strength or outstanding throwing ability, but he is considered very cerebral and has been described as a "quietly efficient chess master of football."

Fiedler's teammate Rosenfels, 25, the son of a Jewish father, is the Dolphins' third-string quarterback. Obtained last summer from the Redskins, who made him a fourth-round draft pick three years ago, the 6-4, 215-lb. signal caller was a standout at Iowa State. He managed to come on in relief in only four Miami games in 2002.

Guard Lennie Friedman, 26, is now a Washington Redskin after three years with the Denver Broncos. The onetime Denver second-round pick stands 6-3 and weighs 285 lbs. He started in 22 of 34 games with Denver.

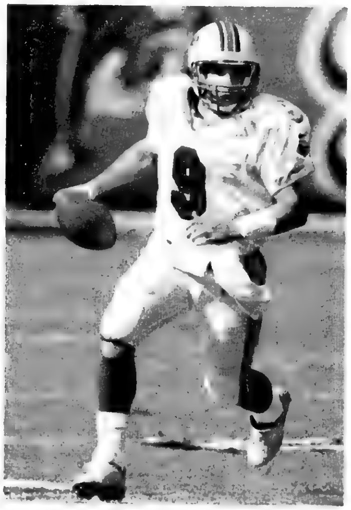
The Duke grad was an all-star calibre player and a gifted scholar in college. He earned three letters in football, two in basketball and three in track and field.

College All-American Mike Rosenthal, 26, formerly a four-year New York Giant stalwart, headed north this season to don the purple of the Minnesota Vikings at right tackle. The Notre Dame star also earned two letters in basketball as a forward and served as team captain in his final season on the court.

The fifth-round Giant draftee, at 6-7 and 315 lbs., will add size and skill to Minnesota's defensive line, since he is top notch on the sweeps, as well as being a good drive blocker and extremely competitive on pass protection.

Hayden Epstein, 22, hopes to become a reliable field goal kicker for the Vikings in 2003. He played briefly with Jacksonville last year and was cut in late October after being successful five of nine times and failing to make a field goal longer than 34 yards. The Michigan grad is 6-2 and weighs 212 lbs.

Josh Miller, 33, of the Steelers is an eight-year NFL veteran who has never had a punt blocked. He has punted 493 times and averaged 43 yards per kick. The 6-4, 220-lb. Arizona grad is a left-footed punter with a strong leg and was a two-time all star in the Canadian Football League with the now-defunct Baltimore Stallions.



Jay Fiedler

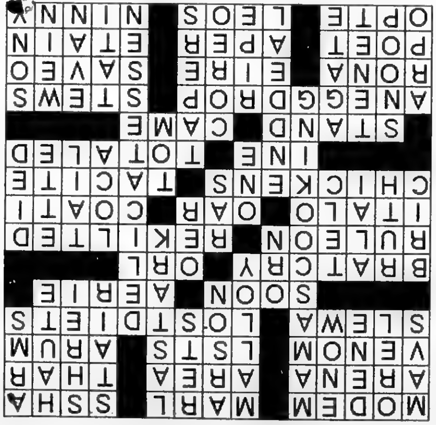
As for the future Jewish footballers, only one Jew was drafted last spring. Antonio Garay, 23, out of Boston College, a fifth-round draftee of the Browns, plays defensive end. He stands 6-4 and weighs 300 pounds. Garay made the Browns roster and is listed as a backup defensive lineman on the club's depth chart.

The Falcons signed two free agents, linebacker Ben Mahdavi, 23, out of the University of Washington who is 6-1 and weighs 238 lbs. and Mike Saffer, 24, a a 305-lb., 6-5 tackle out of UCLA. The Falcons later waived Mahdavi from the injured reserve list after coming to an injury settlement, and two weeks later, they waived Saffer as well.

On Sept. 1, the Vikings signed offensive tackle Adam Goldberg to their practice squad. The Wyoming grad stands 6-6 and tips the scales at 318 lbs.

The Panthers are giving 6-4, 261-lb. Mike Seidman, a UCLA grad, a shot at tight end.

FLIP OVER FOR ANSWERS TO CROSSWORD.



Complacent Israel held by Maltese minnows

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Avraham Grant, coach of Israel's national soccer team, said prior to last week's game against Malta that he still believed Israel had a chance to make the playoffs in next summer's European Championship. He obviously didn't take into account the possibility of anything less than a win against Malta.

In what must have been one of Israel's worst-ever displays, a Maltese side that had yet to score a point in the championship campaign, held Israel to a 2-2 draw and polished off Israel's remaining hypothetical chances of finishing second in its group.

Prior to the contest, Grant lashed out at those who had criticized him after Israel's humiliating 3-1 defeat by Slovenia the week before. In an implicit attack on former national coach Shlomo Sharf, Grant recalled Israel's home defeat against Finland a decade ago. But last week it was Grant who managed to lead Israel to new lows.

From the beginning, it was clear it wasn't going to be Israel's night. In the fourth minute, Maltese captain David Carabott forced Shavit Elimelech into a diving save with a shot from 25 metres out.

Four minutes later, Elimelech completely misjudged a corner kick, but Michael Mifsud missed in front of an empty goal.

In the 15th minute, completely against the run of play, Haim Revivo put Israel in front after a defensive error by Malta.

Eyal Berkovic, not for the first time, went out injured before the halftime whistle and Israel lost its slender advantage in midfield. But the bad news came after the interval when Malta scored twice within the space of two minutes.

In the 51st minute, Belgian referee Eric Blareau ruled that Shimon Gershon handled the ball and Mifsud hit a low, powerful shot past Elimelech to level the score. A minute later, Carabott, who was marking his 119th appearance for his country, launched a powerful shot from the right that deflected off Gershon for the visitors to take a 2-1 advantage.

Israel sent men forward to try and stave off the embarrassment, but managed only to breach Malta's tight defences in the 78th minute, when Pini Balili found the net with a well-timed header from a Shai Holtzman cross. Revivo tried to score on a twice-taken free kick, but on both occasions sent his shot high over the crossbar.

Grant, who has another four years left on his contract with the Israel Football Association and has so far shown no signs he has any intention of taking responsibility for Israel's catastrophic performance, said after the game that the week had been one of the toughest in his career.

"We made mistakes that are unacceptable at international level. The result is an enormous disappointment. I hope we will learn and draw conclusions," he said.

Berkovic called the game a direct continuation of Israel's disgraceful defeat by Slovenia. "The campaign was a failure. You can't argue with the facts. Our next campaign is over a year off and we will have to choose a new squad, work hard and be prepared. There is always another start."

Malta coach Siegfried Held said that before the game, he told Grant he hoped Israel would still be in shock from the earlier game against Slovenia.

"I'm glad it happened," Held said.

"Israel is a good team, but the defeat by Slovenia took the wind out of its sails. The Israeli players no longer believed they could reach the playoffs. It's our first point in the tournament, and it could save my job."

In other action, France beat Slovenia 2-0. Had Israel beaten Malta, it would have meant it still stood a chance of qualifying for the playoffs.

יעל זליגר

צלו של רוזנדורף, מאת: נתן שחם

נתן שחם, בנו של הסופר אליעזר שטיינמן, נולד בתל-אביב בשנת 1925. בוגר הגימנסיה "הרצליה" וחבר קיבוץ בית אלפא מאז שנת 1945. נתן שחם כתב למעלה מחמישים ספרים, מחזות, ספרי ילדים וביוגרפיות ספרותיות. זכה בפרסים ספרותיים בארץ ובחו"ל.

הספר צלו של רוזנדורף נפתח במותו של רוזנדורף מדום לב. כזכור, את קורט רוזנדורף פגשנו בספר אחר של שחם: רביעית רוזנדורף. לסופר, דרך אגב, השכלה מוזיקלית שאותה רכש בקונסרבטוריון "שולמית" והוא עצמו ניגן על כינור וויולה. ובכן, על-פי הסיפור, רביעית רוזנדורף הייתה רביעיה של כלי-קשת שהוקמה בשנת 1936. בין ארבעת המוסיקאים נרקמו יחסי גומלין ובין כל אחד מהם לארץ ישראל שבה בקשו להשריש מחדש את התרבות האירופאית שממנה נעקרו. המאורעות בארץ ובעולם הפרו מדי פעם את ההרמוניה של האמנים שבעצם מבקשים דבר אחד בלבד: לנגן יפה.

גם לונטל בדעת אביו של ארנון שאין שום ערך בעיסוק בחקר היסטורי. למעלה מזאת, צריך לחדול מן השימוש בעצם המילה היסטוריה. "אני איני יודע מה זה היסטוריה, הלוא אילו היה דבר כזה, היה אפשר ללמוד ממנה משהו; האם אנו מכירים אנשים שלמדו מן ההיסטוריה משהו אחר חוץ מצידוק להשקפותיהם!"

נתן שחם זכה בפרס ספיר לספרות לשנת 2003 עבור צלו של רוזנדורף. בין יתר נימוקי השופטים נאמר: ביד אמן מנוסה ובוטחת, חושף הספר, שלב אחר שלב את היחסים המורכבים והפרדוכסלים, שבין ספרות ומציאות, אמת ושקר, בריאות וחולי, נאמנות ובגידה, מוסרי ובלתי-מוסרי.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman

May a local shul charge out of town guests a fee for high holiday seats?

Money and religion often make for a volatile, albeit necessary mix. Jewish law requires that all members of the local community contribute to the building and maintenance of a shul, school, mikvah, library and the like, regardless of the amount of usage they make of these institutions. In fact, a minority can force an unwilling majority to allocate funds for such purposes – despite the protestations of the majority that they are happy to, for example, pray in somebody's house (or not pray at all).

While Jewish communities no longer have the coercive powers to tax their members, guidelines developed over the centuries are still applicable on a volunteer basis. Recognizing that each community member benefits equally from institutions and services but that each may have different economic means, Jewish law has generally allocated half of basic synagogue expenses on a per capita basis and half based on ability to pay. The costs of "extras" such as fancy windows or a beautiful social hall should be borne mainly by wealthier members of a congregation.

The late Rabbi Moshe Feinstein ruled that one is not allowed to leave a synagogue with high dues and establish another shul with cheaper dues. This ruling applies, even if the nusach (prayer style), tunes or even ideology of the new shul are more in line with those of its founders (provided the practices of the established synagogue do not violate Jewish law).

In theory, a community is within its rights to deny non-paying (well-to-do) members the right to daven in a shul, not just on the High Holy Days, but all year. However before implementing such a harsh policy, one must determine if overall religious observance would thereby be enhanced, taking into consideration such factors as whether alternative "free" services are available.

However, the requirement to pay "membership" dues only applies to residents of a community. In keeping with communal hachnasat orchim (the welcoming of guests), visitors should be welcomed without the expectation of a fee. This approach, I believe, should be adopted worldwide, so that membership in one shul entitles one to seats in any other shul. Imagine what that would do for Jewish unity.

For the sake of the children

Editorial

The two youngsters, whose unaffected curiosity is flawlessly captured by the camera, are children of Israel.

The cloudless, deep blue sky behind them belies the storm of terror that has broken upon the land these past three years. Alas, there appears no imminent sign on the horizon that the storm will abate.

Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky recently told a Toronto audience about a new, terror-induced phenomenon that has taken hold in Jerusalem.

Members of families leave notes of love whenever they leave the house. However mundane and routine the reason for the departure – a child going to school, a parent to work or a sibling merely going shopping – a note of love and of possible farewell is left behind, usually on the kitchen table, so that no words might be left unsaid in the cruel event that the child or the parent does not return home.

We therefore greet the coming year as we did last the one: with hope in our hearts and a prayer on our lips that this year will bring the people of Israel closer to peace.

Rosh Hashanah is the holiday of judgment. We are sustained by the traditional belief that one of the key underpinnings of our world is justice, even though it is not always apparent to our merely human sensibility and understanding.

But where is the justice, we cry out, when suicide bombers wantonly and deliberately slaughter children returning from an outing at the Kotel?

Where is the justice, we cry out, when the United Nations General Assembly protects the chief planner and practitioner of terrorism?

Where is the justice, we cry out, over and over again?

We extend greetings for a Shanah Tovah to all our readers

Dear Friends,

On the eve of the New Year, as is customary, we will recite the blessing: "May it be Thy will to renew unto us a good and sweet year," for the people of Israel and all human beings.

We pray that the year 5764 will herald blessings for the people of Israel, that we will live in security in our country – our homeland – and that world Jewry and all of humanity will be granted a tranquil and secure life.

We pray that the much yearned-for peace between us and our neighbours will be attained and that 5764 will see the disappearance of anti-Semitism in the world and a strengthening of the bond between the Jewish people in Israel and those in the Diaspora.

Moshe Katsav, President of the State of Israel

The free world strongly desires to live in peace and freedom. Humanity has the basic right to live without fear of terror. Israel has been suffering from terrorist attacks since the beginning of the Zionist movement and we believe that only a determined fight and international co-operation in the political, military, economic and judicial fields can end them.

I thank the Jewish communities for their expressions of solidarity with the State of Israel during this difficult period for its people. These increase our unity and lift our spirits. We are proud that, despite all the difficulties, aliyah is continuing. An extensive aliyah can change Zionist and Jewish history and the state of Israel.

I wish you and your families a good and blessed New Year, a year of success and the fulfillment of all our national and sovereign desires.

Sincerely,
Moshe Katsav

Looking forward, looking back

The sounding of the shofar ushers in the period of Yamim Nora'im, the Days of Awe, a time for personal reflection and retrospection. As this will be my last Rosh Hashanah as the national president of Canadian Jewish Congress, I take this opportunity to contemplate some of the organization's extraordinary challenges and remarkable achievements over the past year acting on behalf of the community's vital interests.

Rosh Hashanah of 5763 had barely ended last year when a violent mob forced the cancellation of a speech by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu at Concordia University. We are all familiar with the events of that day, which garnered international attention and touched off a series of activities that are still unfolding. Within days of the riot, officials from CJC's Quebec region met with Montreal's chief of police.

Keith Landy, National President, Canadian Jewish Congress

When, two months later, the notoriously anti-Israel Concordia Student Union (CSU) voted to ban Hillel, Hillel decided to sue the CSU and Concordia's administration. CJC offered advice, office space and established a special legal assistance fund that raised thousands of dollars to offset legal fees. CJC also sought and obtained intervener status in the case that goes to court in October.

Also in November, CJC mounted an international conference in Montreal, "Jews from Arab Lands: A Forgotten Exodus," that focused on the largely untold story of the 900,000 Jews forced from their homes in Arab countries. We must ensure that their plight be included in the historical narrative of the Middle East conflict. Any peace plan must address the material losses of Jewish individual and communal property. (For more on this topic, please see this issue's Rosh Hashanah supplement.)

The Jewish community of Canada and CJC were once again thrust into the international spotlight in December by the shocking statements of former chief of the Assembly of First Nations David Ahenakew. The news broke late on a Saturday night and by early Sunday morning, CJC staff in Ottawa and Toronto were at work in their offices, designing the appropriate response and fielding a flurry of media enquiries. The outpouring of support for our community and the strong

New envoy arrives in Toronto after stint in Egypt

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Aside from the fact that Cairo and Canada both begin with the same two letters, Ya'acov (Cobie) Brosh sees little similarity between his posting here as Israel's new Consul General to Toronto and Western Canada and his two stints at Israel's embassy in Cairo, where he served as minister counsellor from 1992 to 1994 and again from 1996 to 2000.

For one thing, Brosh appeared on radio and television more than once during his first month here to comment on terrorist attacks and other issues concerning Israel.

In Egypt, he noted in a recent interview at the Israeli consulate in Toronto, although there was some interaction between embassy staff and the media, there would never be published accounts of anyone having met with embassy staff.

Brosh said that although Egyptian papers, run by government-appointed editors, were full of hostile and inaccurate reports on Israel, the existing peace between Egypt and Israel is "very solid. The Egyptian regime doesn't want to break the peace."

From an economic standpoint, he said, peace is beneficial to the Egyptians.

"The Egyptian on the street doesn't like Israel, although he might like you personally," Brosh said.

He and his wife Ronit had Egyptian friends, and although on occasion they or other Israelis at the consulate met with "unpleasant situations" – being asked to leave a store, for example – it was rare. Once, he said, he was refused entry to attend a seminar at the University of Cairo to which he had been invited.

Ya'acov (Cobie) Brosh

"[The Egyptians] are very nice people, very calm, very polite, but they are educated to hate Israel and to believe any terrible story about Israel," said Brosh.

A member of Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs since 1987, Brosh served most recently as director of the Jordan, Syria and Lebanon division. He has also served as director of the Palestinian affairs division and senior director general of the ministry of regional co-operation.

In his new position, he would like to continue the work of his predecessor, Meir Romem, in co-operating with the local Jewish community. He also wants to see that Israelis living here don't lose their connection to their homeland, and to promote tourism and trade.

Currently, he said, the total annual volume of trade between the two countries is $1 billion, equivalent to one day of Ontario-United States trade.

"Another thing," he added, listing his priorities one after another. "I believe that if 'Mr. Canada' – the average Canadian – is aware of the circumstances in the Middle East and knows a bit more about who is really the aggressor, who doesn't acknowledge the right of the other to exist, whose minds are

A diminutive giant

From the editor's desk

It's hard to find Natan Sharansky in a crowd. He is, after all, rather diminutive. But wow, he sure can draw a crowd.

Last week, on a windy, rainy Monday night, more than 3,000 people came to hear him speak at the Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto. He was the guest of both Israel Bonds and the synagogue, delivering the annual John and Molly Pollack lecture. The advertised subject of Sharansky's talk was "Democracy: Judaism and Islam in the Middle East."

Diminutive is an adjective that applies only to Sharansky's physical stature, for he stands barely over five feet tall. But his moral and intellectual stature is that of a giant.

Especially in the Diaspora, he is still the embodiment of the oppressed Soviet Jews whose yearning for freedom and whose courage inspired us all.

The audience responded to him with a standing ovation and a rising tide of loud, enthusiastic applause even before he had spoken a single word.

He began with an anecdote about his days under constant KGB surveillance and in prison.

The KGB constantly mocked and scorned him. "You are alone," they taunted. "No one cares about your struggle. Look who is supporting you: only students and housewives!" (The protesters and petition organizers in North America)

"But their taunts had no effect," Sharansky told us. "When I was in prison, I had no doubt, even for one second, that history is on our side and that in the end, we will win.

"And in the end we did win," he said. "The KGB was defeated by students and housewives!"

Sharansky drew upon that anecdote to establish a moral context – clearcut right versus clearcut wrong – for the struggle Israel finds itself in today.

"Israel is going through extremely difficult times. For three years, we have been fighting a war of terror. But this is a unique war where there is no front, no rear, where everyone is a target.

"But Israel is fighting this war," Sharansky said, "with a sensibility for human life that is unmatched even among the other democracies of the world."

To illustrate his point he referred to the infamous battle in Jenin last year.

The Israel Defence Forces had identified a small enclave of homes in the heart of the city as a terrorist base. It was a murderers' redoubt and the IDF was determined to root them out. The terrorists had insinuated themselves deep into the physical infrastructure of the city centre, alongside innocent men, women and children.

"What would other countries do in this situation?" Sharansky asked rhetorically. "We know what Syria would have done, because we know what they did to the people in Hama. We know what Russia would have done, because we know what they did to the people in Grozny. We know what the NATO alliance would have done, because we know what they did in Yugoslavia."

Rather than simply bomb the homes where the terrorists were known to be hiding, the IDF sent its soldiers into trip-wired alleyways and booby-trapped homes. They fought the terrorists house to house. Twenty-three soldiers lost their lives, and 54 terrorists were killed.

"Thousands of Palestinians would have been killed had the IDF adopted the operational tactics of the Syrians, or the Russians or even of NATO," Sharansky said. "But Israel chose a different way of fighting its particularly cruel enemy, a way that ensured minimal civilian casualties."

The invidious and false international outcry that followed the operation in Jenin, accusing Israel of a massacre and of crimes against humanity, "said a great deal about the hypocrisy of the world, especially the United Nations."

Sharansky covered a great deal of territory in his remarks, which included a discussion of the Oslo peace process. He characterized it as flawed from its inception, because it propped up a dictator, who by nature, habit, design and ambition is not interested in peace with the Jewish state.

He also reflected upon the incongruity of growing anti-Semitism (of which the Jenin accusations were a frightening example) in the free world, especially in Europe, even as Israel is caught in a never-before-seen war against a brutal and ugly form of terrorism.

"A double standard is at play in international fora that constantly singles out and condemns Israel," he said. "At the United Nations, for example, Israel has been the subject of approximately 30 per cent of all the resolutions passed there."

Without notes or prepared text, the former refusenik spoke firmly and assuredly, inspiring us with the clarity of his thought, the force of his ideas, and the rhythmic cadence of his heavily accented speech.

He concluded his remarks with a sentiment that many of us will carry into the new year. "We have to be strong. We have to be one. We have to believe in the rightness of our cause, that in fighting for the freedom and the security of the people of Israel, we are also fighting for the freedom and security of the world."

Bell removes allegedly anti-Semitic Web site

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Bell Canada has removed a Web site hosted by its Sympatico Internet service that allegedly violated the Canadian Human Rights Act by exposing Jews to hatred and contempt.

The move came about one month after Ottawa lawyer Richard Warman complained about the site to Sympatico's customer service department. Though Sympatico representatives initially agreed the material was unacceptable, it was not removed until Warman filed a complaint with the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC).

In the complaint, Warman alleges the Web site (www3.sympatico.ca/tom.winnicki) violated Canadian law by stating the "holohoax [was] debunked" and by adding: "We're coming for you, you Jew fucks, you and your servile dogs too." Later, the reference to Jews was changed to Zionists.

Warman said he was frustrated by Bell/Sympatico's response, which initially was "positive" but which, as the summer dragged on, did not include specific action against the site.

Don Blair, a spokesperson for Bell Canada, attributed the delay to "a miscommunication." When Bell representatives attempted to examine the Web site, they found it had been temporarily removed by the customer (Tom Winnicki).

Later, when they finally viewed it, "we found it was in violation of our acceptable use policy. That is grounds for suspension or termination," Blair said.

The site was immediately suspended, but Bell Canada has not yet determined whether Winnicki's Web privileges will be permanently cancelled. That will depend on the outcome of a yet unscheduled meeting between Bell and Winnicki.

As a high speed Internet subscriber, Winnicki is entitled to a free Web space of five megabytes, Blair explained. Once a customer creates his or her own Web site, Bell "does not monitor content on the Internet or on our customers' personal Web sites."

The company does, however, respond to concerns and complaints by determining whether the customer violated its acceptable practice policy, he said.

The policy, posted on Sympatico's Web site, prohibits posting material that "is defamatory, obscene, child pornography or hate literature."

Meanwhile, Warman has also launched a $10,000 defamation suit against a London-based white supremacist organization and its Web master.

In documents filed in Small Claims Court, Warman alleges the Web site (www.northernalliance.ca) described him as an enemy of free speech, questioned his morality, integrity and professionalism as a lawyer and described him as a member of communist political groups.

Warman's Statement of Claim also alleges the Northern Alliance and its spokesperson, Jason Ouwendyk, acted in a "malicious, reckless, callous and reprehensible" manner, warranting aggravated and punitive damages of $10,000 each.

Ouwendyk told the London Free Press his group would defend the statements. Its statement of defence argues the Northern Alliance's Web site is too obscure to be visited by Warman's colleagues and so, his reputation couldn't be affected by its contents. It also argues the CHRC's rulings are considered by many to suppress free speech.

The Northern Alliance's Web site states it was founded in 1997 as an advocacy group to promote freedom of speech and to protect and advance "the rights of Canadians of European descent."

Warman, who works for the CHRC, said the Northern Alliance Web site posted personal information about him, including his place of work and his picture. "That certainly made me concerned," he said.

Suing a racist group is an unusual step, Warman said, but "I think it's just a case of people being held accountable for their actions… Responsibility goes along with the right of free speech.

'If you let the little stuff go, it snowballs into bigger things.

"It's the classic 'Get them while they're small before it snowballs out of control' " he added.

NDP would scrap education tax credit, says Hampton

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Like his Liberal counterpart Dalton McGuinty, Ontario NDP leader Howard Hampton would scrap the Equity in Education Tax Credit, which provides relief for parents of children in private and faith-based schools.

Ontairo Election '03

In a CJN interview last week, Hampton, whose party holds nine seats in the legislature going into the Oct. 2 provincial election, said he would do away with the credit, a popular measure with many in the Jewish community.

Introduced by the Conservative government in the 2001-2002 budget, the credit was to be worth up to $3,500 per child annually by 2006.

McGuinty, who leads in the polls, has vowed to repeal the measure, and Hampton said he would do the same.

"We would discontinue what we refer to as the private school tax credit. We believe public funds should flow to public schools. That is the position we have held for a long time and it continues to be our position," said Hampton, who has led the provincial NDP since 1996.

Howard Hampton

While he said he's examined "different models" of funding, the NDP believes in clear and unmistakable lines between public and private schools.

"Public funding should be limited to publicly funded schools. A decision about a private education is essentially a private decision, and will have to be paid for privately."

The sole concession to private education Hampton would make is provision of health services to students.

"No matter where children attend school, if there are health services that are necessary, those should be provided publicly, and on a not-for-profit basis."

Hampton, a 51-year-old lawyer who served as attorney-general in Ontario's NDP government from 1990 to 1993 and as minister of natural resources from 1993 to 1995, said he has not encountered anger from Jewish voters over the federal New Democrats' perceived lack of support of Israel.

"It could well be, but not that I have noticed," he said.

Hampton said he "most certainly agrees" with the recommendations of a religious coalition that has called on all the party leaders to address child poverty in Ontario.

The 61 faith leaders, including several rabbis, asked Ontario politicians to commit to more affordable housing, improved child care and an increase in the minimum wage and welfare benefits.

They also called on Ontario party leaders to match federal funding for affordable housing, as well as to stop the provincial clawback of funds from the federal National Child Benefit and to increase shelter allowances.

Hampton said the NDP would immediately increase the minimum wage to $8 an hour (the Liberals say they would do the same over four years).

He said Ontario disability support benefits need to be increased after being frozen for nine years. Social assistance, and in particular shelter allowances, would also be boosted by an NDP government.

Hampton said he would end the clawback of child benefits. He would also freeze rents in large cities, and has pledged to build 32,000 affordable housing units over four years and 11,200 supportive housing units for the homeless.

Hampton said many Tory policies on home care and long-term care have been "quite wrong."

"The cutbacks to home care and the move toward private delivery of home care have both resulted in less home care services being made available to seniors who want to remain in their homes," he said. "Simultaneously, the effort to almost force seniors into nursing homes and long-term facilities are much more costly than home care solutions would be."

Hampton's approach has three prongs: Home care should be a priority; private or for-profit delivery should be taken out of home care, which he said would free more money for patient care; and institutional care should be provided on a not-for-profit basis.

With those measures in place, "we believe you would find the capacity to significantly increase the health care budget."

Hampton said he supports the creation of a provincial hate crimes registry that would allow all police agencies to share information. He also supports the use of the Criminal Code and the Ontario Human Rights Code to prosecute incitement of hate against identifiable groups.

The CJN asked the party leaders for interviews. At press time, we had not heard from Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty.

Eves defends Tory record

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

As Ontario Premier Ernie Eves sees it, his government's Equity in Education Tax Credit is a matter of fairness and parental choice, not a sop to a certain constituency.

Ontario Election '03

"We are very committed to the principle of equality in education. Equality in education to me means ever child in Ontario should have the equal opportunity to have a good education," Eves told The CJN in an interview last Friday between campaign stops.

"I'm in favour of parental choice. That's not a bad thing. It's a good thing. I've strongly spoken out in favour of parental choice in education. Certainly Jewish schools deserve the same opportunity as other children in society get."

While some voters contend that Eves' Tories tout policies that are antithetical to Jewish values regarding social justice, others have welcomed the tax credit, at least, for finally paying heed to the concerns of beleaguered parents with children in Jewish day schools.

Ernie Eves

Eves, 57, premier since April 2002 and finance minister in the Mike Harris government for six years, dismisses claims the tax credit will siphon money – critics say up to $500 million a year – from the public school system.

"It does nothing to take away from public education in the province," he said. "But it does help level the playing field for parents who choose to send children to independent schools."

Eves said the Tories are spending more money on public education "than any government in history."

He said his government, in response to the recommendations of a commission headed by then University of Guelph president Mordechai Rozanski, infused public education with $610 million in improvements "within 24 hours" of the release of Rozanski's report late last year.

He said the Tories also introduced a fair funding formula in 1998 to equalize per-student funding across the province, eliminating a disparity of up to $3,000 per student.

"Surely the goal of any educational system should be to make sure every student is treated equitably, fairly and equally," Eves said. "It shouldn't depend on what part of the province you live in, the economic circumstances of your parents, your ethnic background or your religious beliefs."

He said the government this year is spending $15.3 billion on public education at the elementary and secondary levels, to rise to $16.2 billion by 2005.

In fact, Eves said the Tories are spending more than the Rozanski commission suggested.

"He recommended $1.8 billion over three years. We're actually spending about $2 billion over three years. [Liberal leader Dalton] McGuinty's response to Rozanski is to spend $1.6 billion over four years."

The premier took the Liberal leader to task on private school funding.

"Interestingly enough, Mr. McGuinty himself is quoted by the Canadian Jewish News back in December of '98 saying he had no opposition to ensuring that public funds support Jewish day schools. Now he's vehemently against it. It's a little inconsistent to say the least. I think the Jewish community deserves better."

(McGuinty was quoted as telling a 1998 meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress that he had no ideological opposition to Jewish day schools receiving public funds.)

In response to last week's call by 61 leaders from faith communities to all the heads of Ontario political parties to address child poverty and policies affecting families, Eves said the Tories' new Ontario Child Benefit is designed to take children off welfare by increasing the per-child benefits received by their parents.

On the day the Campaign Against Child Poverty released its position, Eves wrote a letter to campaign co-chair Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld saying the Tories have nearly doubled spending in children's social services since 1995 to more than $2.2 billion a year.

(Rabbi Bielfeld told The CJN that the government's new plan is "a positive step," but the Tories have still not fully dealt with other areas the religious coalition wants addressed: increases in the minimum wage, welfare rates, quality child care spaces and affordable housing, as well as ending the provincial clawback of funds from the federal National Child Benefit. "It's all very vague," Rabbi Bielfeld said of Eves' response.)

Eves is proud of his government's reduction of welfare rolls.

"When we came into office in 1995, there were 1.3 million people on welfare We have taken 620,000 off welfare rolls and given them the dignity of a job, which is the best form of assistance you can give to people. We won't be happy until every person is taken off that list and every person who is employable has gainful employment.

"There are one million more people working in the province because of our tax-cut and grow-the-economy philosophy than were working in 1995."

Eves also takes credit for increasing community-based and home-care health funding by 70 per cent over eight years, to $1.2 billion a year.

"Our government was first to come along [to make] significant improvements to home care and community-based care for seniors."

Until the Conservatives came to power, there had not been a single long-term care bed established in Ontario in a decade, he said.

"We came up with a plan to build 20,000 more long-term care spaces. [Of those], over 17,000 have been realized."

Eves said he has no objection to a provincial hate crimes registry, but "it would be more effective if we have a national one."

He said it was also the Tories who introduced instruction in hate crimes at police colleges, and, under former attorney general David Young, instructed Crown prosecutors to seek tougher sentences for hate crimes and increased security at places of worship.

For the children's sake

But even as we shake our fist, metaphorically, at the world, woe to us if we lose our balance under the weight of our anget. For it has been that sense of balance along the thin line between hope and despair that has kept us strong throughout the millennia.

Rosh Hashanah is a time to focus on our traditions, values, sense of peoplehood and purpose that comprise the delicate fulcrum of that balance. Rosh Hashanah must be a respite from that anger so that when we look around us, we see clearly our family and the splendour and beauty of this precious world.

At perhaps the moment of our people's greatest distress in the last century, the late chief rabbi of the United Kingdom, Joseph H. Hertz, ministered to the needs of his fellow Jews, whose souls had been battered, made weary and despairing by the Nazi atrocities.

It fell to him to assuage the shattered emotions and strive to mend among his fellow Jews the faith in God that had been shattered. How could one reconcile God's recondite love with man's brazen cruelty?

Rabbi Hertz spoke of Rosh Hashanah as the inspiration for our ability to remain true to who we are.

"Rosh Hashanah opens a new heaven for us and reveals to us the existence of the stars of repentance, prayer, and love… On the larger arena of the world, where good and evil are pitted against each other, Rosh Hashanah bids us to feel ourselves under the eternal obligation by all that we deem precious and holy, to throw our weight on the side of the good and to help make it prevail. Every one of us is a sentinel in that fight, a soldier in an Army of Righteousness, commanded by our Captain on High.

"Let us do our utmost; God knows, that is often little enough. Let every one of us take his share of the burden of the communal or national life – however high or humble that share be. 'Woe to him,' say the rabbis, 'who thinks, ah well, I will neglect my duty...

"During the conflict with Amalek, the hands of Moses grew weary, and they took a stone and put it under him. Could they not have given him a chair or a cushion? But then he said: Since my brethren are in trouble, lo, I will bear my part with them; for he who bears his portion of the burden, will live to enjoy the hour of consolation."

Rabbi Hertz's message is timeless.

It is indeed unjust that the children of Israel should feel the need to leave notes of farewell merely when going to school. But Rabbi Hertz reminds us that railing, with fists clenched, we must all bear our part in fighting that injustice.

We must do so for the sake of all of the children of Israel, for our own sake and for the sake of the balance that prevents us from falling away from who we are and what we were meant always to be.

Shanah tovah.

Provincial Election 2003

I am sincerely dismayed with the readers of this paper who are rationalizing their selection of non-PC candidates in the upcoming provincial election. They seem to ignore the successful decades-long work by community organizations to get some governing body to recognize their responsibilities to fund or help fund all children's education in this province, as most other provinces have done.

Remember, for many in our community, public schools do not offer a viable alternative to Jewish day schools. I would say voting is a matter of prioritizing one's issues. For those readers to place the guarantee by Ernie Eves and his party of funding support for Jewish children's education below a promise by all the other parties to do away with that support seems a curious response.

Robert Samery
Toronto

It is time for the Jewish community to pay attention to its needs. We have rarely asked the government for anything for ourselves. The current provincial government's effort to provide some equity in the education system for those who choose alternatives for their children has yielded an increase in accessibility to Jewish education.

That should be our first priority as a community. Vote Progressive Conservative on Oct. 2.

When I go into the voting booth, I have to choose the candidate whom I believe will best be able to advocate for my issues – all my issues. No one is perfect, and no party is perfect. But Premier Ernie Eves and the Progressive Conservatives stand where I stand on most of my issues, including the economy, social services, taxes, public education and the Equity in Education Tax Credit. I believe that Eves and his team are better able to lead Ontario than the two other parties.

I am extremely disappointed with the Sept. 18 Editor's Desk column ("Conscience and voting," CJN, Sept. 18).

Far be it from the editor of The CJN to actually list Jewish education (or any other Jewish cause) as a priority that should rank ahead of other issues in the upcoming provincial election. A list of priorities for the Jewish community is obviously not on your agenda or is beyond the scope of The CJN.

What a pity that some of our Jewish leaders have such a poor understanding of the value of Jewish education!

What a pity that you can only recognize when the physical, but not the spiritual, safety of Jews is compromised. (I assume The CJN would make an exception and tell people to vote for a party that opposes anti-Semitism, if the other side promoted anti-Semitism, even if it meant worse government.) And what a pity that the issues of discrimination and intermarriage rank so low on the scale of priorities to the editor of the largest Jewish newspaper in Canada.

The Editor's Desk column of Sept. 18 was quite disappointing ("Conscience and voting," CJN, Sept. 18).

You could have stressed the importance of Jewish education for the future of the Jewish people. That would have been a wonderful message.

This column would have been a wonderful place – and very timely – to stress the importance of working for proper funding of our schools, yet it failed to do so. It was counterproductive.

If we lose the Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC) in the near future, it will be a major setback – at least for the more committed elements of the Jewish community. It will hurt UJA coffers (people like me can barely afford to give, and I am not alone). It hurts our ability to support Israel. It effectively pulls the carpet of financial security out from under the committed middle class of our community. The EETC, when fully implemented – and I fear it may never be – would bring into the community fully 50 per cent of a year's UJA campaign. Imagine the health and strength that would promote in our community.

If we cannot look out for our own best interests, nobody will.

For decades, the Jewish community has been struggling to end religious discrimination in the provincial education funding formula, no matter how the calculation has been made. The current government has instituted a tax credit that is a first step in achieving this goal. The official Opposition has categorically stated that it will repeal the Equity in Education Tax Credit without offering any alternative to it. In effect, it is saying that funding Catholic religious education is good, while funding of non-Catholic religious education is not so good. Your column ("Conscience and voting," CJN, Sept. 18) urges people to vote their conscience. Well they should: vote to end religious discrimination in education, not to perpetuate it.

The full-page ad in support of the Harris/Eves government in your Sept. 18 issue by the self-styled Jewish Political Action Committee troubled me on two counts. It's bad enough that its supporters believe the only issue Jews need consider in this Ontario election is tax credits for private schools. Exactly what Jewish texts, values or traditions teach Jews to be oblivious to a Conservative government legacy that includes Walkerton, health care cuts, underfunded schools, and worst of all the bullying, blaming and neglect of those least able to sustain themselves? I think I hear Hillel's venerable reply: "And if I am only for myself, what am I?"

Which brings me to my second complaint. The sponsors of this ad misappropriate and besmirch our name by pretending to speak on behalf of an entire community and people. I urge all readers of The CJN to dump the Conservatives on Oct. 2.

Canadian complicity in the injustice

By STANLEY A. URMAN

Canadians take great pride in a foreign policy that is ostensibly based on principles of democracy, human rights and the rule of law. However, when it come to the issue of refugees arising from the Arab-Israeli conflict, Canada has not distinguished itself, either by its policies, or by its international leadership role.

In the comfortable confines of Canadian homes, few can fully understand the abject fear and acute suffering that refugees who are driven from their homes are forced to endure.

One refugee, Giulia Boukhobza, wrote an article in the July 1 issue of the International Herald Tribune about her experience in Libya in June 1967. "[T]he anti-Jewish atmosphere in the streets became terrifying, so much so that my family could not leave our house in Tripoli," she wrote. "My parents and I, along with my seven brothers and sisters, sat frightened at home for days. And then the mob came for us."

Boukhobza's story is about one Jewish family that eventually had to flee for their lives from a Jewish community in Libya that had maintained a continual presence there for more than 2,000 years. Her plight was similar to hundreds of thousands of other Jews who were forced to flee from some 10 Arab countries in the Middle East and North Africa from 1947 onward. The international community exuded a reprehensible lack of balance, and Canada was complicit in restricting its political and humanitarian efforts solely to the plight of Palestinians who became refugees as a result of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

This differential treatment becomes more incomprehensible in light of the fact that there were more Jews uprooted from Arab countries (more than 850,000) than there were Palestinians who became refugees (the United Nations estimate is 726,000) when numerous Arab nations attacked the newly established State of Israel in 1948.

And yet, when the issue of refugees is raised within the context of the Middle East conflict, people invariably refer to Palestinian refugees, not Jews displaced from Arab countries. This is a fundamental injustice, as the rights of former Jewish refugees are no less legitimate than those of Palestinian refugees. Indeed, there are some who contend that the plight of former Jewish refugees is more egregious than Palestinian refugees, because they became victims in four different ways:

- In most Arab countries, Jews suffered state-sanctioned repression, endured mass violations of human rights and were coerced into leaving solely because they were Jews.
- In virtually all cases, individual and communal property was confiscated without compensation by Arab governments to their rightful owners.
- Once Jews left their countries of birth, Arab regimes erased any trace of Jewish existence and tried to expunge the rich, vibrant Jewish legacy from the historical lexicon of the region.
- The plight of Jewish refugees fleeing from Arab countries was virtually ignored by the international community.

Canada was an acquiescent participant during the years the United Nations ignored the perils befalling Jewish refugees. The statistics provide a damning indictment of the international community:

- Since 1947, there have been more than 681 UN General Assembly resolutions dealing with virtually every aspect of the Middle East and the Arab-Israeli conflict – 101 of which refer directly to the Palestinian refugees.
- In none of these 681 resolutions is there a specific reference to, nor any expression of concern for, the dangers faced by 856,000 Jews living in Arab countries.
- Numerous UN agencies and organizations were involved in a variety of efforts, while others were specifically created, to provide protection, relief and assistance to Palestinian refugees. No such action was forthcoming from these UN agencies for Jewish refugees from Arab countries.
- Since 1947, billions of dollars have been spent by the international community – by the UN, its affiliated entities and member states – to provide relief and assistance to Palestinian refugees. During that same period, no such international financial support was ever provided to ameliorate the plight of Jewish refugees.

Canada should not have been a party to such disproportionate and differential treatment. At the UN, and in its leadership capacity as "gavel" of the Multilateral Working Group on Refugees, Canada has not only been complicit but has seen fit to foment and sustain this travesty of justice.

This baffling and unconscionable conduct is demonstrated in a number of ways:

- Security Council Resolution 242

Adopted on Nov. 22, 1967, Resolution 242 is still considered one of the seminal blueprints on how to promote peace in the Middle East – including the refugee issue.

The official Web site of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Affairs (www.dfait-maeci.gc.ca/Peaceprocess/keyissue-en.asp) states Canada's interpretation of this resolution as follows: "Canada considers there must be a just solution of the Palestinian refugee issue as called for in Security Council Resolution 242."

This is a gross distortion of the historical record. Resolution 242 stipulates that a comprehensive peace settlement should necessarily include "a just settlement of the refugee problem." No distinction is made between Arab refugees and Jewish refugees, yet Canada has seen fit to advocate for a "just solution" only for Palestinian refugees.

This was clearly not the original intent of Resolution 242, as evidenced by the unsuccessful attempt by the Soviet Union's UN delegation to restrict the "just settlement" solely to Palestinian refugees. Moreover, justice Arthur Goldberg, the United States' chief delegate to the United Nations at the time who was instrumental in drafting the unanimously adopted resolution, has pointed out that:

"A notable omission in 242 is any reference to Palestinians, a Palestinian state on the West Bank or the PLO. The resolution addresses the objective of 'achieving a just settlement of the refugee problem.' This language presumably refers both to Arab and Jewish refugees, for about an equal number of each abandoned their homes as a result of the several wars."

It is unacceptable for Canada to circumvent the original intention of Resolution 242 and to promote a decidedly distorted interpretation in favour of Palestinian refugees.

- Canada's voting pattern at the UN in 2002

Last year, at the 57th session of the General Assembly, numerous anti-Israel resolutions were adopted by overwhelming margins, betraying once again the decided anti-Israel bias that permeates the UN.

Canada voted in favour of the seven draft resolutions made by the Special Political and Decolonization Committe, all of which were later adopted by the General Assembly. In so doing, Canada supported a resolution that, among other things, expressed "grave concern about the increased suffering of the Palestinian refugees" and reaffirmed "that the Palestine refugees are entitled to their property and to the income derived therefrom, in conformity with the principles of equity and justice."

Again, nowhere in any of these or other resolutions adopted by the UN in 2002 was there any reference to the rights of former Jewish refugees from Arab countries.

This contrasts starkly with Canada's position on the General Assembly's resolution on the Situation of and Assistance to Palestinian Children, which, in part, expresses concern about "the grave deterioration of the situation of Palestinian children." In explaining its decision, "Canada abstained on this resolution because it does not acknowledge that the current conflict has taken a toll on both Palestinian and Israeli children."

There is no logical justification, nor any equity, in Canada abstaining on one resolution because it betrays a lack of balance (on children) and voting in favour of numerous other resolutions that betray a similar lack of balance (on refugees).

- Multilateral Working Group on Refugees

The 1991 Madrid Conference launched historic, direct negotiations between Israel and many of its Arab neighbours. Canada was asked to play an international role by assuming the "gavel" of the Working Group on Refugees, one of five such multilateral committees set up to address regional issues.

On the official Web site of Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs and International Affairs (www.dfait-maeci. gc.ca/Peace process/rwg-intro-en.asp), the introduction to the group states:

"The continuing plight of the Palestinian refugees displaced by the Arab-Israeli conflict is among the most important issues to be addressed by the Middle East Peace Process."

While this statement may be true, it belies the original intention of the Working Group on Refugees, and exposes Canada's skewed view of its leadership role.

In his opening remarks at a conference convened to launch the multilateral process held in Moscow in January 1992, then-U.S. secretary of state James Baker made no distinction between Palestinian refugees and Jewish refugees in articulating the group's mandate: "The refugee group will consider practical ways of improving the lot of people throughout the region who have been displaced from their homes."

However, since its inception, the Working Group on Refugees, with Canada in the chair, has not addressed the issue of Jewish refugees. In conversations with the first two senior Canadian officials who held the "gavel," both stated that the group should not be dealing with rights of former Jewish refugees.

The activities of the Working Group on Refugees underscore this perspective, as all initiatives have dealt exclusively with Palestinian refugees: a scholarship fund for Palestinian refugee women, research on solutions to the Palestinian refugee problem, relocating refugees from Egypt to Gaza, administering a "Canada Fund" development program for Palestinian refugees and organizing formal missions to Palestinian refugee camps, including those in Lebanon and Syria.

In sum, it would be an injustice to ignore, in any Israeli-Arab peace process, the rights of Jews from Arab countries. It would be a distortion of history, and would constitute a fundamental inequity, to recognize any rights for Palestinian refugees without recognizing the rights of these former Jewish refugees as well.

Even the most recent peace proposal provides a means to redress the legitimate rights of former Jewish refugees. Phase III of the road map peace plan, currently being advanced by the United States, Russia, the European Union and the UN, refers to an "agreed, just, fair and realistic solution to the refugee issue" – once again, language applicable both to Palestinian and Jewish refugees.

For any peace process to be credible and enduring, it must address the two populations of refugees that arose out of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

If it wishes to remain a principled interlocutor in the quest for Middle East peace, Canada must embrace the moral and legal imperative to ensure that the rights of Jews from Arab countries are secured and that the issue assumes its rightful place on the international agenda.

Yom Kippur in July

It's a staple of cheesy advertising: ads declaring it's "Christmas in July" and offering major discounts on clothing, appliances, etc. I guess a bargain never hurts.

For me, it's always Yom Kippur in July.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

During my vacation, I begin working on my High Holy Day sermons. I do this because I've learned that Murphy's law has particular application to High Holy Day sermons: computers break, illnesses occur and funerals get scheduled all shortly before the holidays, making sure that any procrastinating rabbi is duly punished for leaving things to the last minute.

It's peculiar writing words for the Days of Awe during the lazy weeks of summer. The laid-back rhythms of vacation are not the ideal environment for inspiration. The weighty themes of the High Holy Days seem very faraway from sun, surf and ice cream.

Yet, there's actually a lot of inspiration around in the summer. Because of my Yom Kippur mindset, I look at the ordinary in extraordinary ways, and I've found that simple summer pleasures are often quite sublime.

Transcendence is everywhere. Life is not just life, it's a miracle. According to the midrash, every blade of grass has its own angel, calling it to life. These angels are on prominent display in the summer.

Sunrise. Waves. Trees. Mountains. Grass. Birds. Grasshoppers. Breeze. Clouds. Sunset. Moon. Crickets. Stars. There are so many small miracles, so many ways to experience what Einstein called a "cosmic religious feeling."

But you don't need nature to find inspiration. Sometimes it can be found around the barbecue. Friendship is not just friendship, it is a divine experience. If two people truly connect, it cannot be mundane. Every moment of friendship, even chatting and laughing together, contain divine sparks, the product of two souls in close contact.

And then there's family. Of course family vacations have a labile quality to them, jumping between the annoying and the endearing, but they certainly are about family. And loving families are a miracle. The love of a parent, sibling or spouse is too remarkable for materialistic explanations. Love is clearly from beyond this world.

Now, all of the above – the mushy, sermonic stuff – is actually an introduction to the following anecdote.

One afternoon, I was taking a walk with my three-year-old daughter. She tugged on my hand and pointed to sky, saying, "Look Abba! A cloud! A cloud!"

Tears welled up in my eyes.

Yes, it was only an ordinary occurrence, a moment of father-daughter small talk. But I started to think about the miracles of clouds, the miracle of her life and the miracle of our love for one another. And for an instant, it was truly Yom Kippur in July, an ordinary moment filled with great inspiration.

Open sesame and smile: a new story of hope

Think Sesame Street and a smile comes to your face. Think Sesame Street with joint content, aired simultaneously on Israel's children's channel, Jordan TV and 10 Palestinian television stations – and you become incredulous.

I'm not naive, but neither am I cynical. The story of the new Sesame Stories series illustrates more than anything the complexities of Israeli-Arab relations today. It tells of hopes, disappointments, fears and determination. It also demonstrates the potential and limitations of joint work in an atmosphere overshadowed by clouds of violence and hatred.

Five years ago, at the height of the peace talks, Sesame Workshop (Sesame Street's parent company that engages in worldwide productions) conceived of an Israeli-Palestinian-Jordanian co-production that would integrate Israeli and Arab characters and identical programming, and would involve joint production teams. The goal was to use the Sesame Street platform to impart messages of tolerance and acceptance of the "other" for kids aged four-seven.

It wasn't the first time that Sesame Workshop had worked in Israel. Nearly 20 year earlier, it had pioneered the highly successful Rechov Sumsum (the series is also marketed throughout the United States as a Hebrew-learning tool). In 1995, it initiated an Israeli-Palestinian joint series that aired on Israel's educational TV but never made it to the screens of Palestinian television.

This time, the intifadah rudely interrupted what was already a challenging planning process. It was hard enough for Israeli, Palestinian and Jordanian producers to overcome cultural and political sensitivities and to hammer out joint messages, characters and puppets. Terrorism against Israelis, closures and curfews in the West Bank and Gaza, hostility and anger – all were antithetical to the very essence of the series.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Only the creativity and tenacity of the teams themselves as well as Sesame Workshop's patient intervention allowed a compromise to let the project to go forward. Instead of jointly produced programming, a pool of animated and live segments was created for inclusion in each of the three sister series – all of which remained committed to the series' key messages in their own productions.

Last month, HOP! – Israel's highly successful children's channel – premiered its series to critical acclaim. The leading daily, Yediot Acharonot, wrote: "Someone should sit the Israeli government and the Palestinian Authority down to watch some of Sesame Stories before the next punch around." Next month, Jordan TV and the Palestinian Ma'an network (10 independent, local television stations affiliated with Al-Quds Educational Television) will do the same.

Ironically, perhaps, the Jordanian involvement is the most significant. Sesame Street has never aired in Jordan, and the inherent openness of the series and its messages are a novelty there. The connection to Israeli/Jewish programming has only fuelled criticism in hostile press coverage of the series. Nevertheless, the show's producers are determined to air, and Queen Ranya of Jordan has given the series her blessing.

As for the Palestinians, the choice of production outlets itself is interesting. Most Palestinians consume television news from satellite stations such as Al-Jazeera and pay little attention to the official, limited Palestine Broadcast Corporation. However, independent television stations have a following because they are grounded in local communities. Some of these stations provide the best examples of how pluralistic Palestinian television could evolve, and of the difference that can be made with an investment in independent production. In the early days of the intifadah, I was told that one of these independent stations actually broadcast names of Israeli victims of suicide bombings, thereby humanizing the Israeli experience.

Skeptics have already declared the project a failure and evidence of the futility of any joint efforts while bombs explode in the streets. I disagree. Like other small groups of Israeli and Palestinian teachers still working together, these creative educators believe that if another day will come, the groundwork has to be laid now. Teaching children to hate requires little effort; teaching children to be tolerant is a Herculean task in the reality of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The people involved don't believe for a minute that they can change the world. In fact, they know that they have no impact on the bigger picture. But they are inspired by our sages' teaching: "Who is a hero? One who turns an enemy into a friend." Shanah Tovah.

After nearly nine years at The CJN, I'm taking a leave for several months. Thanks to all my readers for your interest and support. I'll be back next summer.

New values for a new year

This Rosh Hashanah, we Jews in North America once again find ourselves in an anomalous position. For most of us, life is grand. We belong to one of the safest, strongest and wealthiest Jewish communities in history, blessed by the security, bounty, and liberty of the United States and Canada. For many of us, thankfully, our central moral challenges have to do with the dangers of decadence, the seductions of excess, rather than the depredations of hunger or fears of attack. As a result, too many of us live unthinkingly in our cozy little bubbles, insulating ourselves from the outside world's challenges.

Gil Troy in Montreal

And yet, if we unplug our Walkmen and listen just a little bit, we hear screams of pain in our own neighbourhoods, our Jewish community and our beloved Israel, let alone the rest of the world. Most of us who reside in cities live scandalously close to neighbourhoods where children are neglected, families have disintegrated, schools fail to teach and the streets are unclean and unsafe.

Even many Jewish communities are filled with the sick, the poor, and the abandoned elderly. In Israel, 22 per cent of the people face poverty while thousands of families have been shattered by the murderous Palestinian onslaught. And in Africa, millions of people are starving to death or being murdered by organized insanity – up to 3 million people have died in the Congo alone.

We can't all be Gandhi. We are not programmed to renounce North America's playgrounds and shoulder the world's burdens. But especially this Rosh Hashanah, with the unfortunate constants of poverty, disease and social dysfunction compounded by the scourge of terror, how dare we continue with business as usual. Shouldn't we inconvenience ourselves just a little bit and alter our lifestyles just a whit to help our fellow human beings?

How can we continue planning more and more elaborate birthday parties for our children – let alone more and more extravagant bar and bat mitzvahs for our teenagers – without diverting more resources to the needy? Wouldn't we feel better about ourselves if we replaced the usual excessive pile of presents at these events with a pile of tzedakah cards – initiated either by the hosts or the guests – sending money to a terror victim we have adopted or to an impoverished Israeli school? Wouldn't we respect our rabbis, teachers and principals more if they risked our wrath and pushed us to give more generously, more systematically? And shouldn't we, instead of waiting for leaders to push us in the direction we need to go, lead our peers to the right place?

We have all collaborated in building an upside down world, a twisted world of distorted values and misplaced priorities. We – and sadly this "we" applies especially in too many parts of the Jewish community – buy into the social pressure demanding presents galore for so many occasions, the wearing of the latest fashions, the buying of the fanciest things, the throwing of the most elaborate parties.

Those of us who occasionally deviate from that script, who might give a donation in someone's honour rather than an unnecessary gift, who might wear yesterday's fashions and send the unspent money to a worthy cause, are the ones who risk the social opprobrium. People who should feel shame for their excesses feel proud. People who should feel pride for their generosity often feel sheepish.

We are taught in so many ways not to deviate from the consumerist norms, not to appear too self-righteous or judgmental or virtuous. Wouldn't we be better off teaching our children and ourselves to strive – with all appropriate modesty – for more good deeds and fewer fashion statements, for more acts of charity and fewer shopping trips, for more selflessness rather than selfishness, more altruism than materialism? We need to be doers not just givers, investing time not just money, applying our skills and passions to good works, not just fun sports. True, we probably will not solve the world's problems, but we can help – bringing some joy to someone in need, alleviating someone's pain, albeit momentarily.

Let us hope that next Rosh Hashanah we can not only celebrate a worldwide return to sanity, but a new trend, a new set of social pressures pushing us to do good rather than spend wildly.

The Kirshner File

Film festival touched on a variety of topics

Sheldon Kirshner
in Toronto

Several films from Israel, all dealing with various aspects of contemporary Israeli society, were shown at this year's Toronto International Film Festival. A number of European movies, touching on topics ranging from the Holocaust to Islamic fundamentalism, were screened as well.

Broken Wings, by newcomer Nir Bergman, is a gut-wrenching drama about the after-effects of a family tragedy. Nine months after her husband's untimely death, Dafna Ullman remains in a state of shock, as do her her four children, Maya, Yair, Ido and Bahr. Dafna, a midwife in a Haifa hospital, can hardly function. Maya, a budding rock musician and composer, has deferred a budding career. Yair, who aspires to be a professional basketball player, has dropped out of high school and loses himself inside a mouse costume. Ido is suicidal. Bahr, the youngest, feels neglected. The Ullmans, a typical middle-class Israeli family, cannot cope with their loss.

Bergman conveys their pain, anguish and confusion through a succession of taut scenes. In the movie's most poignant moment, Maya breaks down as she sings a sad song about her beloved father. The Arab-Israeli conflict does not intrude into Broken Wings. The closest it comes to that dispute is a glancing reference to Jordan, as in U.S. basketball superstar Michael Jordan.

This is a film about ordinary people coping with grief. The performances, from Orly Zilberschatz-Banai's searing portrayal of Dafna to Maya Maron's star turn as Maya, are superb.

James' Journey to Jerusalem, directed with aplomb by Ra'anan Alexandrowicz, unfolds in Hebrew, English and Zulu. James (Siyabonga Melongisi Shibe), an evangelical Christian from Africa who wants to be a pastor, arrives in Israel on a pilgrimage. His village has chosen him for a special mission: to visit Jerusalem on their behalf and report back with his impressions.

At Ben-Gurion Airport, James is detained, suspected of trying to enter Israel as an illegal worker, and then arrested. Shimi, an opportunistic manpower agent impressed by James' command of English and his knowledge of the Bible, springs him from prison. Shimi places James in a grimy dormitory and puts him to work for his father, Sallah. Whatever illusions James may have had about the Holy Land are summarily shattered.

Being clever and flexible, James quickly adapts to his surroundings. He wins the affection of Shimi and Sallah, who are played respectively by Salim Daw and Arie Elias. Armed with a cellphone, he becomes a labour sub-contractor. He is so busy that he repeatedly postpones his cherished trip to Jerusalem. Materialism trumps spirituality.

This accomplished and likeable film, which resounds to a stirring African musical score, is about the deferral of dreams, the power of faith and the humanity and rapaciousness of people. It is also about an economy that exploits foreign workers and a nation whose idealism is frayed at the edges. Pulling all these strands together, Alexandrowicz skillfully weaves a layered tapestry of a country in flux. And the cast is uniformly terrific.

Amos Gitai's newest movie, Alila, largely takes place in a drab apartment building in a bustling, rundown neighbourhood between Tel Aviv and Jaffa. It opens with Ezra (Uri Klauzner), an unkempt building contractor, engaging his son, Eyal (Amit Mestechkin), a new, nervous army recruit, in a chat about his prospects. Their conversation ends abruptly when Ezra hires several itinerant Chinese workers for a minor renovation project at the apartment.

The camera pans to Hezi (Amos Lavie), a rough-hewn, middle-aged man who rents a flat in the building from Ilan (Liron Levo). Hezi needs the place for trysts with Gabi (Yael Abecassis), a submissive woman half his age. Rounding out the characters are Schwartz (Yosef Carmon), a tormented Holocaust survivor; Mali (Hanna Laslo), Ezra's estranged wife who is having an affair with Ilan; Ronit (Ronit Elkabetz), a hysterical neighbour who casually denigrates Arabs; and Linda (Lyn Shiao Zamir), Schwartz's calm Asian caregiver who drowns out news of a suicide bombing with soothing music from her country of origin.

In its scope, Alila is about nothing and everything: the minutiae of life in a booming city, rocky relationships, human passions and evolving conceptions of Israel. Alila is far better than Gitai's last two films, Kedma and Eden, but not nearly as good as Kippur and Kadosh, which preceded them.

Outcry, Destau Damtou's docudrama, is set in the future in an Israeli development town in the Negev. As a young Ethiopian Jew stares at his handgun, he is engulfed by a flood of bitter memories turning on a fatal shootout with the police in which five of his friends were killed. This fairly brief, disturbing film zeroes in on the problem of juvenile delinquency in the Ethiopian community, which is still in the process of adapting to Israel.

Opposing views are presented. There is a complaint about racism, but also an affirmative statement about Israel as the homeland of Ethiopian Jews. A kess, or community elder, advises a troubled youth to read the Torah and discover his Jewish roots. But a government official claims that Ethiopians are lazy and prefer to live on unemployment benefits.

Outcry presents corrosive truths worthy of examination and debate. But it accentuates the negative and ignores what is positive about the integration of Ethiopians in Israel.

Margarethe von Trotta's Rosenstrasse, based on an actual incident that occurred in Berlin in the winter of 1943, is powerful and memorable. When the Nazis decided to deport a group of Jewish men working in German arms factories, their loyal, indignant Christian wives rose up in protest. Despite threats, these courageous women stood their ground. Their husbands were finally released.

Rosenstrasse, which is named after the small street where these unprecedented demonstrations unfolded, revolves around a fictional character named Lena Fischer (Katya Riemann). Beautiful and aristocratic, she never gives up her valiant effort to save her spouse, Fabian (Martin Feifel). German officials, some in vulgar language, urge her to divorce Fabian, but to no avail.

She asks her foreboding father, an anti-Semitic retired general, for help, but he haughtily dismisses her. Arthur (Jurgen Vogel), her brother, a decorated officer crippled in the war, rallies to Lena's assistance. As she fights for Fabian's life, she shelters Ruth, a Jewish girl whose mother has disappeared.

Dark, brooding and engaging, the film flashes back and forth between 1943 and the present. Ruth (Jutta Lampe), now living in New York, goes into mourning after her husband dies. His death prompts Ruth's daughter, Hannah (Maria Schrader), to investigate her mother's past in Germany. Hannah travels to Germany and persuades Lena (Doris Schade), now 90, to tell her story of unconditional love and valour. And so the circle is closed.

Supertex, directed by Jan Schutte and set in Amsterdam, Tel Aviv and Casablanca, is about family, identity and father-son rivalry.

Simon Breslauer (Jan Decleir), a Polish Holocaust survivor and a textile magnate, is an arrogant man who treats his two sons unequally. He belittles Max (Stephen Mangan), who wants to reorganize the company, but heaps affection on Boy (Elliot Levey), a conformist.

This pleasing film moves along at a rapid pace as Max discovers that Simon, supposedly the perfect family man, keeps a mistress; as Max and his girlfriend part ways over her desire to live in Israel; and as Boy abandons his fiancé and finds bliss in Casablanca.

In Facing Window, a film by Ferzan Ozpetek, a young Italian couple, David and Giovanna, invite a stranger to their modest home in Rome. He is a homeless old man they find wandering the streets in a daze. They soon learn that he is a master baker and Holocaust survivor with a concentration camp number tattooed on his forearm. Facing Window, starring the luminous Giovanna Mezzogiorno, is about the trauma of survival, the joys of life and the importance of undiminished dreams.

Monsieur Ibrahim, by Francois Dupeyron, features Egyptian actor Omar Sharif as an elderly Turkish merchant in 1960s Paris who befriends Momo (Pierre Boulanger), a lonely Jewish boy who lives in the city's colourful red-light district with his depressed father. Ibrahim, a Sufi Muslim, takes a shine to Momo – whose Jewish roots are shallow – and gives him a copy of the Koran to read. After Momo's father vanishes, Ibrahim all but adopts the orphan. They embark on a road trip to Ibrahim's ancestral village in the badlands of Turkey. Monsieur Ibrahim is a nice film with a warm touch.

Bon Voyage, a delicious confection whipped up by Jean-Paul Rappeneau, is set in Paris and Bordeaux just before and after Germany's invasion of France in 1940. As France crumbles, the Nazis pursue a stateless Jewish professor in possession of valuable scientific knowledge. This frenetic film, which stars the imperious Isabelle Adjani, bubbles over with intrigue, romance and espionage.

Siddiq Barmak's Osama, the first Afghan movie since the fall of the Taliban, exposes the primitive insensitivity and cruelty of an Islamic fundamentalist regime that treated women like chattels, condemned them to sexual slavery under the guise of unadulterated morality and considered non-Muslims "infidels." In a word, Osama is explosive.

Israelis, Palestinians have much in common: rabbi

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

What unites Israelis and Palestinians is far more significant than what separates them, says Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, chief rabbi of Efrat, an Israeli community in the West Bank.

"Even though we may look different and have different interests, we are all people who want to live, laugh and love," he said at a lecture sponsored by the Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman Centre for Jewish Learning at Holy Blossom Temple, on the second anniversary of 9/11.

After a moment of silence to commemorate the anniversary, Rabbi Riskin, who made aliyah from his native New York about 20 years ago, said that there are four Palestinian villages near Efrat with whom Efrat has "magnificent relations. In the end they want exactly what we want – to be able to sit with their children and grandchildren in peace."

In the past three years, he said, lives in Efrat have been saved by Palestinians who warned residents about impending attacks.

Speaking shortly after the death of his friend David Appelbaum and his daughter Naava, 20, in a terrorist attack on a Jerusalem café, Rabbi Riskin said that the situation in Israel is not a case of moral equivalence. "We are targeting murderers and they are targeting innocent men, women and children."

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin

Israelis are criticized when they defend themselves against suicide bombers, he said, "but what are we to do? We are fighting against a terror that if we give it an open door it will destroy civilization."

"I believe that the present Israeli policy is right on. I am proud that we are only targeting murderers."

He said he remains optimistic, "because beyond terrorism we are all united by a common humanity. I believe there is a profound connection between ourselves and our cousins the Palestinians."

But despite Efrat's good relations with neighbouring villages, he said, Efrat residents must travel in bulletproof buses and post guards to protect against suicide bombers.

Recently, he said, a Palestinian carrying a knife and a suicide note was discovered in Efrat.

On the other hand, it was a Palestinian friend of the Appelbaums who told the family about the deaths of David and Naava, he said.

Rabbi Riskin said Israelis have always been willing to compromise, but there has never been a Palestinian leader who is willing to negotiate.

"As long as [Palestinian Authority President Yasser] Arafat is pulling the strings, there will never be an Arab democracy. Once that happens, we will be willing to make a hurtful compromise. [Then], we will work with them as equals and make the area a veritable Garden of Eden.

"I believe humanity will gain the upper hand and we will not only survive, but a free humanity will prevail."

Canadians can reach out to Israel and try to ease its burden, he said, by travelling there "no matter what is going on.

"If Israel is Disneyland, come only to have fun. But if Israel is the motherland, come when it needs you."

Israeli youth take part in Ve'ahavta mission to Guyana

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Five youth from the Israeli-based Pirchey Refua (Youth Medical Cadets), travelled this summer to the rainforests of Guyana on a three-week mission with personnel from Ve'ahavta Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief committee.

The team, which included members of Toronto's aboriginal community as well as Jewish students and medical professionals, offered youth leadership programs, educational activities, and health promotion procedures to assist local communities in remote areas of the country.

The five Israeli youth – Roi Zylberberg, 17, Moriya Reznikovich, 18, Ella Mazanov, 18, Racheli Bendett, 17, and Yotam Barak, 17 – also spent a week in Toronto before the trip, assisting Somali-Canadian women in first aid and health education.

Rachel Lasry, Ve'ahavta's international program director, said this was the organization's fourth summer mission to Guyana, but the first with Israeli participation.

What was most striking about the mission, the five Israelis agreed, was that although the more than 40 volunteers came from diverse backgrounds and a from a large age range, everyone worked together as a team.

"We all brought our own wisdom. We had a chance to mix with students, nurses, doctors, Jews from all denominations, and aboriginal youth – age was not an issue; everyone became friends and we could all depend on one another," said Barak.

Roznikovich, a volunteer, for Magen David Adom in Israel, taught first aid to various groups in Guyana, where she said even the Israelis found it hot.

"The heat in Israel did not prepare us for Guyana heat. We felt ourselves melting in front of the classroom, but it was all part of the experience. No one complained."

It also taught the Israelis about the value of differences among people, she said.

"We learned to appreciate what we have at home, and we also learned to value the unity of Jews. In Israel, Jews are often in conflict with other Jews from different backgrounds. This helped put things in perspective.

"Sometimes people feel uncomfortable about being different and try to be like other people. On this trip, we supported one another, and were made to feel proud of who we are."

Zylberberg said it was a challenge for the shomer Shabbat members of the group to maintain their traditions in such an environment – they were provided with kosher food –"and we all admired them for their strength [of convictions.]"

In the past four years, Ve'ahavta has made a name for itself in Guyana, Lasry said, but "this year Israelis brought a new dimension to our work.

"There is a very positive image about Jewish people in Guyana. Some knew so much about the Bible that we were able to learn something from them. We were told they have a deep connection with the Old Testament."

Mazanov, who is going into the Israeli army, said her experience in Guyana made her see life in Israel differently.

"I am ready to defend my country with more passion. When I am removed from my typical surroundings, I see things from a different angle," she said.

"We did feel disconnected to Israel, however, when we learned there had been a terrorist attack. It was strange not to be there during such a time."

Youth from the Israeli-based Pirchey Refua (Youth Medical Cadets), assisted a group of Somali-Canadian women with first aid and health education before travelling to Guyana on a mission with Ve'ahavta Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief committee.

Toronto's Ronald McDonald House sincerely apologizes for scheduling this year's Toddle for Tots fundraising event on the same date as Rosh Hashanah.

This unfortunate error was made unintentionally.

In future all event scheduling will be more carefully reviewed and approved to avoid conflict with major holidays and observances.

Media Line journalist covers Israel – warts and all

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to the CJN

In Jewish circles, demanding "accuracy in reporting" is often a euphemism for being pro-Israel.

But as bureau chief for news services with Washington, D.C.-based The Media Line, David Zev Harris takes the phrase seriously, dishing out reliable truths, even if they depict Israel in a negative light.

Harris, who made aliyah from England in 1996, spoke to The CJN about The Media Line's activities during a recent trip to Toronto.

Founded in 2001 by husband-and-wife team Michael and Felice Friedson, the service is a response to a lack of depth and background in mainstream media coverage of the Middle East, "whether pro-Israel or anti-Israel," Harris says.

Messages not always popular

Though he's often invited to speak to synagogue groups, Harris, with a background in political science and journalism, is aware his message may not sit well with Jewish audiences.

"When people say 'Aren't you another HonestReporting.com or CAMERA [Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America]?' the answer is no," Harris says.

"Those organizations are preaching to the choir," he says. "We are a legitimate news organization… like Reuters, or other news agencies."

Diaspora Jews are rarely shown the whole picture when it comes to Israel, Harris says.

"The country is in a mess politically, economically, socially… Just to make out that Israel is a bed of roses… is simply not reflecting the truth."

Holding Israel accountable has an upside. "If Israel does something wrong, it is a democracy, and it should be criticized… If you say Israel can do no wrong, you will never be treated seriously," Harris says.

David Zev Harris

"If we were simply an Israeli or Jewish organization, we would not be credible."

Last year, when Israel fought a fierce battle in Jenin as part of its anti-terror incursion into the West Bank, "it was clear that Israel was in the right," and The Media Line used that hard-won credibility to strongly defend Israel's actions, he says.

But The Media Line's Mideast coverage is about more than the ongoing conflict, Harris says. It also includes lighter fare, such as stories about a swimmer from Iraq, one about "joint environmental projects between Israel, the Palestinians and Jordan" and an interview with an Israeli chef.

"If you don't tell the light stuff, people will believe Israel is just a war zone."

Syndication in hundreds of newspapers around the world and by news organizations such as the BBC, plus a daily radio program and a TV show in the works, are testaments to The Media Line's success, Harris says.

Much of the anti-Israel bias in mainstream media isn't due to anti-Semitism, Harris says. Often, Israel simply doesn't present itself well.

Its politicians must "learn the art of the sound bite" rather than giving "clever answer[s]… that last 2½ minutes," which is too long for the major networks, he says.

Mixed messages also confuse journalists. With the Palestinian Authority, "there is only one message," while in Israel, "you could have [interim Labour party leader] Shimon Peres saying X and then… [Prime Minister] Ariel Sharon saying the opposite."

To a journalist, Harris says, "a right-wing MK calling Palestinians 'animals' is far sexier than a left-wing MK saying we have to be lovey-dovey."

While he advocates intelligent journalism, Harris is guarded about the effectiveness of letter-writing campaigns, in which individuals often mail a standard letter to news organizations. Harris says he has heard from editors that "those types of campaigns end up in the garbage."

Editors think that "it's clearly a bunch of Palestinians or Jews or people defending gay rights… [and they ask] 'Why should we take notice?'"

But, he says, "if 20,000 people cancel their subscription… that can have an effect."

Letters should be factual and calm, he says. Give "concrete examples of dates, and [close] with the conclusion that [you have] no choice [but] to cancel." Harris suggests contacting a media outlet or a well-informed rabbi before writing.

Harris says intelligent debate means "not just [getting] information from pro-Israel sources."

But the best way for North American Jews to understand Israel isn't through the media at all, he says.

"Go to Israel… meet Israeli people… A teacher, a dentist, a soccer coach. [Or] go for a week or two and offer courses… a week of free dental treatment, teach kids to play soccer. That way you'll find the real Israel."

For Harris, Israel isn't just a country at war – it's home.

His own weekly soccer group includes people "from the United Kingdom, Canada, the U.S., Switzerland, France, Brazil, Argentina, Peru, Australia and South Africa … Jews from around the world who share one thing – the State of Israel."

Besides soccer, Harris loves "going out into the desert… and looking up at the stars," an activity he says gives him hope.

"Maybe there is a God up there and maybe things will turn out alright."

Harris and The Media Line can be reached at dzharris@themedialine.org.

Lodz to mark anniversary of ghetto's liquidation

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation, a modest North York synagogue established by Holocaust survivors, was the scene of a recent poignant meeting between the Polish consul, the mayor of Lodz and about 15 elderly members of the synagogue.

Sitting at a long rectangular table set with rogelach and danishes, Mayor Jerzy Kropiwnicki invited the congregants to return to Lodz next summer to commemorate the 60th anniversary of the liquidation of the Lodz ghetto.

For the anniversary – which will be marked by ceremonies on Aug. 29, the date of the last transport from the ghetto – he promised to restore the run-down former train station, through which ghetto inhabitants passed, to the way it looked in 1944. He also pledged to repair the Jewish cemetery and plant trees and bushes there, and to organize a commemorative route through the ghetto, with information plaques about its history.

Last month, the Lodz city council earmarked 1 million zlotys (almost $385,000) for the project after "a long and painful discussion," he said. Although there was initial opposition from almost half the 43-member council, the vote was almost unanimous, Kropiwnicki said.

"I know for many people it will be very difficult emotionally, but I think it's necessary for the younger generation to see it and to learn from it," Kropiwnicki said.

David Rybowski, president of the congregation, said although he had mixed feelings, in a way he was also thrilled that the mayor had chosen the Lodzer Centre to visit.

A native of Lodz who has lived here since 1950, Rybowski met his wife Zenia in the Lodz ghetto before he was taken away by the Germans in 1941 at age 17. "I never wanted to go back," he said.

Kropiwnicki, who was elected last November, said he learned of the significance of the anniversary from Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, a founder of Zegota, a Polish organization that helped Jews during World War II. Both men were ministers in the Polish government together.

Kropiwnicki said he's taken on the commemorative project because "it's decent and it's right. I cannot say I had many Jewish friends, because I had few. I cannot say I'm Jewish by origin, because I'm not. And I cannot say I had leftist feelings, because it's not true."

He has appealed to mayors of German cities Cologne, Frankfort and Dusseldorf, who readily agreed to contribute funds to the project, he said. "I'm just appealing to decent people who feel uneasy, the same way I feel uneasy."

Jews made up one third of Lodz's total population in September 1939, when Germany invaded Poland, Kropiwnicki said. The Jewish community was "one of the most important organizing forces of the city," he said, citing as one example large factories built by local Jews.

The Litzmannstadt ghetto, so-called for the name the Germans gave the city, was the second-largest in Poland, after the Warsaw ghetto. Two hundred thousand or more Jews, including some from other European countries, passed through it before it was liquidated, said Kropiwnicki.

Today the "registered" Jewish population numbers 250, although the mayor believes there are up to 1,000 people who have Jewish roots. There is a synagogue, a Jewish students' association and day care for the elderly, added Jaroslaw Nowak, executive director of the city of Lodz and a member of the organizing committee for the commemoration, who was among the three city staffers accompanying the mayor.

The meeting came about after Rachel Iskov, a PhD student in Holocaust history at Clark University in Worcester, Mass., visited Lodz in July and learned the city was organizing an event to commemorate the destruction of the ghetto and that a delegation would be travelling to North America to meet members of the Jewish community. Kropiwnicki has also met with survivors in Israel

Iskov told Nowak about the Lodzer Centre, where she has attended services with her family from the time she was a child. She flew in from Boston for the meeting.

Kropiwnicki said he would like to "invite you all to see not only the tragic past but also the glorious past and how the city lives today." By late October or early November, he said, more information would be posted on a page linked to the city's Web site. Nowark added that the city is still seeking former residents of Lodz to send them information.

Unique gift provides peace of mind for Israeli children

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

Thanks to the generosity of a Toronto woman and her late Christian grandmother's love for Israel, close to 200 Israeli preschoolers – and their parents – are enjoying peace of mind this school year at a daycare centre in central Israel.

When Ethel Wade passed away on Canada Day 2002 at the age of 99, she left her two granddaughters each a cheque for $28,000. For one of them - Barbara Wade Rose - who converted to Judaism in 1982 at the age of 24 - the decision to donate that cheque to improve the lives of Israeli children came without hesitation.

"I didn't need the money for myself as much as these Israeli children did," says Wade Rose, herself the mother of two girls. "I really felt the need to do something like this, something that was in essence reaching back in history, and, at the same time, towards the future for the Jewish people."

The benefactors of Wade Rose's generosity will be the children and staff of a daycare centre located in Kfar Gvirol, a suburb of Rehovot. The funds pay the salary of a security guard for one year.

"It's funny, in a way, that my grandmother was a staunch and devout Christian, her son – my father – is an atheist, and I felt a pull towards Judaism," says Wade Rose. "Actually, I was going through the conversion process at Holy Blossom when I met my husband, Jonathan. Ironically, that's one of the things he found so fascinating about me, because although he was born Jewish, his family wasn't religious at all."

Barbara's grandmother, Ethel, travelled the world more than once in her lifetime, including trips to Japan and Kenya, where she slept on tree tops "so the tigers couldn't get her," says Wade Rose. But of all the places Ethel visited throughout her life, Israel always held a special place in her heart.

"She always talked about The Mount of Olives and about Jerusalem," says Wade Rose. "I think because my grandmother was, in her own way, a pioneer of sorts, moving from northern England to Calgary in 1903, she had some sort of affinity with the pioneering spirit of Israel and its people. My grandmother was always a very pro-Israel Christian, and somebody who believed that Israel was always in the best hands when the Israelis were 'in charge.' Ethel always loved the Holy Land and found her trips to Israel so enjoyable."

The opportunity to donate money toward the safety of Israeli children is one reason why Barbara Wade Rose finds her decision to convert to Judaism so fulfilling.

"Living my life as a Jew has been so incredibly rewarding," she says. "Judaism has given me the perfect opportunity to have my heart involved in a religion without giving up my head. Every Friday night at dinner we ask each other what mitzvot we performed that particular week. The week that I gave the money to the preschool, I had a great answer, and it feels so wonderful."

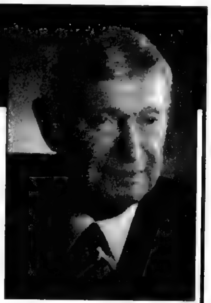
legacy of life

Eric Exton 1919 - 2001



Eric Exton always considered himself lucky, even though sometimes life didn't appear that way.

He felt lucky to be born into one of only four Jewish families in Freital, Germany, and had a happy childhood despite a looming war. His parents, Alois and Ida Eckstein, owned a four-storey department store and hoped Eric would one day run the business himself.

But when the store was destroyed during Kristallnacht, it was the Nazis, not Eric, who took over the business. Alois managed to secure his son passage to England, where lucky Eric found work at a textile mill in the British town of Wigan and was taken in by a Jewish family who taught him his first words of Yiddish. When German forces invaded the British lowlands, Eric was interned with 3,000 other Germans on the Isle of Man and then shipped off with 800 men to Camp N in Sherbrooke, Quebec. His parents escaped to what was then Palestine, but many of his extended family perished in the Holocaust.

Eric eventually made his way to Brantford, Ontario, where his sister Ilona lived, and soon after, relocated to Toronto. He was finally safe and sound, and spent the next 60 years dedicating himself to his family, his work, and his community. With his wife Esther by his side, the impeccably dressed gentleman built SEEL Enterprises into a leading mortgage investment corporation while working tirelessly for UJA Federation, B'nai Brith Canada, Jewish National Fund, State of Israel Bonds, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Boys Town Jerusalem and many other causes.

"I never allow myself to get involved in anything unless I can handle it," Eric once wrote in his self-published memoir Zaidie Exton's Odyssey. "Not for me the mere inclusion of my name on the masthead of any movement or organization, for vanity or publicity's sake. If I can't actively participate, contribute, devote time to a cause, I don't participate at all."

As youngsters, children Sybil and Lennie were constantly fascinated by the steady stream of people who arrived on their parents' doorstep to attend parlour meetings, fundraising dinners, or teas. Eric and Esther travelled regularly to Israel on UJA and JNF missions and were constantly on the phone drumming up funds or coordinating community events. It had a profound effect on Sybil and Lennie and they both became leaders in their own right – first as presidents of their respective BBYO chapters and then through to their continued involvement in community today.

An 18 year-old with his own car in Reutlingen.

"We learned from our parents that if you're able to do, then you should," says Sybil. "Dad's community work, his tzedaka, his integrity and his work ethic were always on display for us to learn from, and these lessons were the gifts that he gave to his children and grandchildren. Now I, too, do it from my heart."

Eric, a major donor to UJA Federation's annual campaign, could always be counted on to get involved in various projects because he believed in a strong Jewish community and a strong Israel.

"Eric was never one to dilly-dally," says Ben Prossin, Executive Director of JNF Toronto. "He had a sense of order and time and was very well organized. He was a very trusted adviser who knew the community well and knew who to approach for help when it was needed. People responded to Eric because of his own sense of dedication and purpose. If he asked you to give a donation, he would have already given one himself."

After Esther's death in 1988, Eric's luck prevailed once again when a friend introduced him to Annette, the woman with whom he would share the rest of his life. A war orphan and survivor, Annette adored and admired Eric for his generosity of heart and his compassion for those less fortunate. Says Annette: "Eric was a humble and decent human being and I thank G-d that I was so lucky to have met him." Annette is continuing Eric's good work through The Exton Charitable Foundation.

Even Annette's young grandson, Jason Mortfield, recognized intelligence, warmth and humility when he saw it and described Eric as his hero in a Grade 6 essay: "Zaidie Exton makes me want to be better, especially when I grow up. He's a terrific person, and it shows in how much he loves the family and cares about the world."

Legacy of Life is a presentation of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto to honour the memory of those who were exceptionally devoted to the community.

No short-term solution to Mid-East conflict in sight

Provocative remarks from UJA Federation Israel Today Speaker Series

David Horovitz

By HOWARD ENGLISH

In the long term, Jerusalem Report editor, David Horovitz, sees hope for the future, but, for the time being, he's at a loss to come up with a solution for more peaceful relations between Israel and the Palestinians.

"In the short term, there is no magic fix," he told members of UJA Federation's Fashion Division.

"There is a Palestinian generation that has grown up loathing us passionately. You need a Palestinian leadership that talks differently to its people and there's no such leadership on the horizon."

Looking further down the road, Horovitz believes basic human considerations will dictate a resolution. "I don't think that most Palestinian parents are different from Jewish parents. They don't want to see their children buried."

Despite ongoing terror-related deaths and the presence of Yassir Arafat, who, according to Horovitz, "lied to his people about what Israel offered the Palestinians," Israelis, he said, are "incredibly resilient and astoundingly optimistic." That spirit of optimism is shining through, he added, even though "we in Israel have lost the assumption that…many of the people with whom we are in contact value life."

Horovitz was one of three Israeli speakers so far in a provocative series of UJA Federation-sponsored lectures that has attracted nearly 500 Toronto Jewish community members to date. The Israel Today Speaker Series is a feature of UJA Federation Campaign 2004, chaired by Allan Silber and Richard Venn, which has already raised more than $26 million. Other Speaker Series participants are Ami Segev, an intelligence analyst with Israel's Ministry of Defence; Israel Defense Forces military analyst Colonel Miri Eisen; U.S. foreign policy expert Michael Ledeen; and Tel Aviv terror attack survivor, Anya Farberov.

Lightening the burden of Israel's victims of terror

Since September 2000, Israel and her civilians have experienced a constant string of terror attacks that have killed close to 900, while injuring over 6,000 – many severely. The ongoing violence has also taken away one or both parents from over 400 Israeli children.

One man who is fighting for Israel's victims of terror – adults and children alike – is Boaz Herman, Director of the Jewish Agency for Israel's (JAFI) Fund to Aid Victims of Terror, supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Herman, 38, the father of two young girls, was largely responsible for the structure of the fund, which was implemented in February 2000.

"In the very beginning of all the violence and terrorism, we had between 30 and 40 requests for assistance from victims. Today, three years later, we receive around 100 requests a month," says Herman.

The goal of the fund is to bridge the gap where government funding ends and provide direct support to terror victims and their families.

Boaz Herman

"We are more involved in helping these unfortunate victims get on with their lives, not only to survive, but to live as comfortably as possible in light of their new situation," says Herman. "When people return from being treated in the hospital following an attack, they start to realize that they need to have changes made to their homes, usually to help with their new lack of mobility. I go to their homes, meet with them, and find out what can be done to truly improve the quality of their new lives. For example, one woman needed a machine to help her climb stairs in a wheelchair. The government doesn't pay for this, but we were able to help her."

Fund committee members include representatives from Israel's National Insurance Institute, the Ministry of Defence, the Ministry of Absorption, the Jewish Agency, and various welfare agencies in each Israeli municipality who send new cases and requests to Herman.

"The needs of victims differ in each case," he says. "Sometimes it's not only physical needs, but they are in need of a new start. For example, if there is a woman – a wife and mother – who is the sole survivor in her family, she can no longer deal with living in the same house, seeing her young daughter or son's made bed every day. Sometimes, we will find her a new place to live, a chance to get away. Often these people must get away from their own memories. It is very difficult."

So far, according to Herman, an estimated 1,200 Israeli families – 5,500 individuals - have been assisted by the JAFI Fund To Aid Victims of Terror, with $9.5 million U.S. having been distributed. Two million of that has gone to JAFI's Orphan Fund.

"Over and over I am reminded that it could be me or even my small children who are the victims, and I have strong feelings of obligation, because I know that these victims are paying the price for all of us in terms of preserving our life in this beautiful yet provoking land," says Herman.

"There is a song 'that says that to sorrow there is no end and to happiness there is,' and there is. I have met and spoken to the men, the women, and the orphans. I have been honoured to offer them assistance. Despite their suffering and pain, and the fact that their lives have changed to one full of tears and agony, they have been full of gratitude, praise, and thankfulness to the Jewish Agency and the donors. Maybe we have lightened their burden just a little."

Count Down: New Years 5764

Close to 1,100 people attended Count Down: New Years 5764 held at the York Events Theatre, headlined by DJ Lucky Lou and VJ Eitan Einwohner, who were flown in from Israel. The event was organized by Canada Israel Experience (CIE), National Jewish Campus Life, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and Hillel of Greater Toronto in an effort to engage young Jewish Torontonians in a relaxed setting with a prominent Jewish-Israeli theme. Profits from the event will go to the Mifgash/Encounter program - helping to build a stronger connection between Israeli soldiers and Canadian Diaspora Jews. Many participants were CIE birthright israel alumni from the past three years.

Former CIA director: time to bring democracy to the Arab world

The Arab world is a "bastion of totalitarianism" in the Middle East and western nations have no real alternative but to bring democracy to Arab countries, said former CIA director R. James Woolsey, who led the agency from 1993-1994.

"We are in a war for freedom against tyranny," warned Woolsey, when he addressed 150 participants on the recent UJA Federation Washington Fly-In.

R. James Woolsey, former Director of the CIA

"The major outlying region that is the bastion of totalitarianism is the Middle East," he said. "Islam itself is not the problem. But the Arab world has created a circumstance that is truly pathological."

And without a single democratic state among 22 Arab countries, Woolsey is pessimistic about the chances for peace in the Middle East.

"It is only when we bring the democratic rule of law to the Middle East that we will have success and real peace," he said. "We won't have real peace until the Palestinians stop teaching their children to be suicide bombers."

As a first step, Woolsey believes that the U.S. must succeed in both Iraq and Afghanistan. "This is not impossible – it's just hard," he said. He compared the effort to democratize the Arab world with the transformation of post- World War II Europe from a stronghold of nazism, fascism and communism.

"It took two hot wars and one cold one before change came about," he noted. "We know the Middle East is difficult, without a culture of democracy, but it won't be as difficult as Europe was."

Woolsey called Islamic fundamentalism an "angry ideology with huge resources."

"We have to fight effectively and not politically correctly, but we have to remember where we come from," he added.

At the end of the day, democratizing the Arab world will depend on educating the people who live there, Woolsey said. "We have to convince the good and decent Muslims of the world that we are on the same side."

Encouraging a little "selfishness"

Steven Farber at UJA Federation's recent Washington Fly-In

I volunteer because, quite simply, I'm selfish. In return for what usually is a relatively short commitment of time per week, I have been educated and entertained by fascinating speakers from around the world. I have created new circles of friends with similar interests. I have broadened my business network among other professionals within Toronto, across Canada and abroad. I have travelled to new cities and countries, and I have been exposed to "on the job" leadership training. The benefits that others receive as a result, in my mind, can never measure up to what I have gained.

For me, it all began with a push by a friend to attend Washington 13, a biennial Young Leadership conference in Washington D.C. where it became clear the influence that individual members of a community can have.

As a result, in addition to my canvassing responsibilities for the UJA Federation annual campaign, I have gotten involved in the Israel Advocacy Initiative, the Ben Gurion Society as Co-Chair, the Young Adult Division of UJA, and the Partnership 2000 Committee.

I like to think that my timing in attending the Washington conference was no accident, when Israel's right to exist is being questioned and her citizens are under constant attack and when, outside Israel, Jews are experiencing increasing waves of anti-Semitism and Jewish students are under siege at campuses across North America.

These reasons are why now, more than ever, it is crucial for people to become involved in one way or another. Individuals can make a difference and I know it from my own experiences. A letter to a journalist with a fresh look at a situation will often make it into a column. A letter or a visit to a politician can affect that person's views and the more views that are changed, the greater the chance for a change in policy. Reading the news, books and commentary, visiting Israel, or taking a course can help one to become more persuasive in making the case for Israel.

I encourage everyone to introduce a little "selfishness" into their lives and get involved!

Steven Farber chairs UJA Federation's Ben Gurion Society with Lance Davis and Elyse Lackie.

Kiever Shul gears up for "Caring, Sharing and Herring"

From October 31 to November 2, single Jewish men and women from Toronto, Italy, France, St. Louis, and Los Angeles, will be congregating at Toronto's historic Kiever Shul for a singles shabbaton.

Billed as "Caring. Sharing. Herring," the shabbaton will the first of its kind at the Kiever since the synagogue opened its doors in 1927.

"The Kiever has never seen a shabbaton like this," says organizer Rabbi Gedalia Zweig. "We have had more than 120 inquiries from singles all over the world who want to come to this unique event. Unfortunately, the shul can only hold about 100 people, so we've had to turn some away."

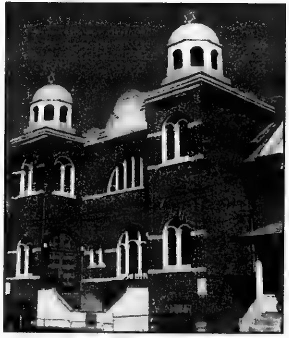
The shabbaton – with financial assistance from UJA Federation - will be offering lectures and discussion groups relating to Israel, relationships, Jewish law, Jewish Toronto, wine tasting and Jewish continuity.

The weekend shabbaton and convention is co-chaired by Alan Ferman and Debbie Bauer.

"We wanted to do something exciting and unique for Jewish singles in Toronto, especially in the age range of 35 to 50," says Ferman, Executive Director, International Jewish Singles. "There are many different programs out there for younger Jewish singles, but fewer for this particular age range."



Toronto's historic Kiever Shul

Ferman adds that the choice of the Kiever shul is no accident.

"The Kiever shul is a beautiful synagogue in the heart of downtown Toronto," he says. "It is also a shul that needs to be revitalized and we see this weekend as one of the key aspects in that revitalization."

The shabbaton will include a Sunday morning brunch held at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, comedian Marc Weiner on Saturday night at Thornhill's Sephardic Kehilla Centre, and a walking tour of historic downtown Jewish Toronto on Saturday afternoon.

UJA Federation donors flying high after Washington trip

By WENDY LAMPERT

Members of the largest delegation ever to participate in UJA Federation's one-day Washington Fly-In recently returned home inspired and motivated to take action on Israel's behalf at a time of urgent need, after hearing from a host of speakers on the U.S. government's relationship with Israel.

The group, which included four university students and a number of high school students travelling with their parents, spent a whirlwind day in the U.S. capital, receiving briefings from members of Congress, a representative from the State Department, Israel's ambassador to the U.S., a former director of the CIA, a political lobbying strategist and a media expert. Participants also visited the Holocaust Museum, linking events of the past with the realities of the Jewish world today.

"It's exciting and enlightening and it gives you a different perspective regardless of how much exposure and involvement you've had in the community," said Marvin Lean, one of 150 participants on the trip. "This experience will help me with my advocacy efforts - it's given me a better ability to convey what needs to be said. I now have more information, more feeling and more support to do what needs to be done."

Fly-In Chairs Richard Diamond, Josh Cooper and Mark Waldman hoped to show how political intervention by Jewish community members in the U.S. could translate into Canadian action.

"It's important for people to step up and get involved in whatever way they can. If we want the Canadian government to take a less neutral stance on Israel, we have to have a strong voice and speak out loudly," said Waldman.

One of the mission's crucial elements was participation by several young people in the experience, said Diamond. Empowering the next generation of Jews to face the new realities of the Jewish world is a key initiative of UJA Federation Campaign 2004, in addition to providing support for Israel's victims of terror and countering a worldwide wave of anti-Semitism.

"The people on this trip are our current and future leadership. It behooves us to train them and give them what they need to be leaders," Diamond said.

For Campaign 2004 Chairs Allan Silber and Richard Venn, an important benefit of the one-day journey into the heartland of American politics was the opportunity to show solidarity with the U.S. in its support for Israel.

"We, as Canadians, need to recognize the role the U.S. has played in ensuring Israel's security and economic viability," said Silber.

"I hope that we've taught 150 community members and leaders to become activists in the political arena," said Josh Cooper. "I hope we've given them the tools and the knowledge to influence all levels of government and the agenda of the Jewish community."

Mission newcomers are motivated to make a difference

For Ruth Milne, the recent UJA Federation Washington Fly-In was a life-changing event.

She was among a group of first-timers aboard, and she offered nothing but rave reviews for the unique opportunity to meet with U.S. policymakers and hear about the American relationship with Israel.

Ruth Milne: ready to get involved.

"I feel as though I've been reborn," said the retired grandmother, whose son convinced her that the Fly-In was an exciting learning opportunity she simply could not miss.

"I felt as though I was doing something for myself I've never done before. I thought I knew what UJA was all about – but I really didn't know. The phenomenal program, the wonderful people and the incredible learning experience – all this in one day? Unbelievable!" she said.

Martin Sterling who joined his sister-in-law, Carole Sterling, a past UJA Federation campaign Vice Chair, on his first UJA journey was thrilled with the result.

Martin Sterling, with sister-in-law Carole Sterling, ready to board the plane on the way home from a day in Washington.

"I was very impressed with the speakers. I feel very inspired. The day helped educate me on the need for advocacy and staying informed – it made me realize that we have to do better in terms of lobbying our politicians in Canada," he said.

"The day was wonderful," said Jeremy Freedman, a longtime volunteer with UJA Federation campaigns, but a first-time Fly-In participant. "This was an informative experience that gave us insight into effective strategies to make a compelling case for Israel," he added.

Now that they're home, these enthusiastic veterans of the Washington Fly-In are ready to take action.

"I'm ready to get more involved in the efforts of UJA Federation," said Freedman. "I'm hopeful that this trip will galvanize and energize the group that was here to make the case for Israel, both within and outside the Jewish community – particularly to Canada's politicians, who need to be awakened to the fact that Israel is the only country in the Middle East which shares our Canadian value system of freedom, democracy and respect for the rule of law."

"If I can do anything when I get back, I'll do it. I have the time and the desire," added Milne.

Israel action motivates Toronto youth

For 15-year-old Ari Diamond, ignorance is not bliss.

He didn't want to be like some of the other students in his high school who don't know much about the Mid-East. So he joined his father, Michael Diamond, on the recent UJA Federation Washington Fly-In.

Ari is one of several high school and university students who participated in the one-day trip to the U.S. capital. He saw it as a chance to get a true understanding of the challenges Israel faces in the international political arena and what young people can do to help.

"It's an escalating situation. I think it's important to keep up to date with what's going on," said Diamond, noting that students at his high school often fight about a situation they don't fully understand.

Brandon Handelman, 16, who joined his stepfather Jordan Soll on the trip, said discussions can get very heated when the subject of Israel comes up at his school. "It's about not being afraid to stand up for your beliefs. You have to keep fighting – you can always do more," he said.

Ari Diamond (left), 15, with father Michael on the Washington Fly-In.

"I now understand what it's going to take to make peace happen," said 15-year-old Kayla Lean, who made the trip with father Marvin Lean and stepsister Jordana Rotman, 16. Jordana agreed. "Being Jewish is more than just saying you're Jewish. You have to act," she said.

For the university students who joined the trip, developing tools to help combat the anti-Semitism and anti-Israel hatred they see on campus was strong motivation.

"Campus issues are the same as the hot topics around the world. I wanted to bring those issues out to those with whom we met and other members of Toronto's Jewish community on this trip, and go back to York (University) armed with more knowledge about the political process and how to influence it," said Aliza Libman, 19.

York University student Jay Solomon, 21, wants to engage more young people on campus to get involved. "There's too much apathy among young people, and I want to change that," he said.

Paul Cooper, 25, another York student, said he feels more optimistic about the future of the Toronto Jewish community after everything he heard and saw in Washington. "I got a fresh perspective on UJA Federation and what they are doing. It's great that educating young people on campus is such a big part of this year's campaign, especially since campus is the breeding ground for future political leaders," he said.

Bialik shows off its latest renovation, expansion

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to the CJN

"Come, with one voice, and shoulder to shoulder, to the aid of your nation!" wrote Zionist poet Chaim Nachman Bialik.

Uri Korin, director of education at Toronto's Bialik Hebrew Day School, said that line has been the rallying cry for the fundraising effort that has fuelled the school's much-needed $7-million building expansion and renovation.

Grade 8 students Zev Smith and Josh Kestenberg were among several students acting as tour guides at a gala evening last week to showcase the newly renovated Bialik building at Bathurst Street and Viewmount Avenue.

They said the expansion came just in time. Since its founding in 1961, Bialik has grown from 43 students to more than 850, and the existing building, even with previous additions, had been showing the strain.

"See that?" they asked, pointing out a basement room. "We were down here last year. We didn't even have windows… it was the most depressing classroom."

Renovations completed in time for the current school year have enhanced almost every area of the building. Even students in the older section are enjoying more space, a fresh look and access to expanded common areas, such as a resource centre.

"There are windows in every classroom," Smith said. "It's like living in paradise."

The school's seven junior and senior kindergarten classes also have a new cubby and coatroom area, a junior resource centre and a padded playloft in every classroom.

Even some older students are jealous. "I want a playloft," Kestenberg said.

In his address at the gala, past president Mark Skapinker said Bialik grew through key land purchases, most notably the former site of a supermarket next door. Crucial to the expansion, he said, has been child-friendly outdoor play areas, thanks to the purchase of an adjacent house. Grass and trees now appear around the school where last year there was just pavement.

"The greening of Bialik has begun," Skapinker said.

The renovations, he added, allow Bialik's physical presence to match the academic excellence the school is known for, and will help keep Bialik "in the forefront" of Jewish education in Toronto.

Among other improvements are an airy, modern entrance on Bathurst Street, expanded science and computer labs, redecorated washrooms – "they're extremely nice," the tour guides assured guests – plus an atrium bridge and mezzanine overlooking a new gym.

The old gym is still in place, to be used for indoor recess and when the new one is set up as an auditorium.

Kestenberg and Smith said they are actually a bit nostalgic for its hardwood floors, but the new gym is much larger, and features a proud blue Bialik "B" on the floor.

They were particularly excited about basketball nets that adjust to accommodate even the youngest students.

Several local dignitaries attended the evening, including Mayor Mel Lastman, who has five grandchildren at Bialik.

The Bialik choir was also on stage, and behind the choir was a wall with handprints in bright, primary colours of the school's 853 students.

A sign above the handprints read, "The future is in their hands."

Building committee chair Mark Nightingale said no matter how the building has changed, Bialik remains true to its core philosophies of menschlichkeit, ahavat Yisrael and tikkun olam.

Uri Korin, director of education at Bialik Hebrew Day School, celebrates the opening of Bialik's expanded campus by affixing a mezuzah, donated by the Hershenhorn family, to the school's new front entrance on Bathurst Street. With him are members of the administration, as well as the oldest and youngest students from each grade.

God helps me carry on, Chavi Rosenzweig says

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It was simply co-incidence that Chavi Rosenzweig spoke on the 14th of Elul at Chabad of Markham about "Keeping Faith in Troubled Times."

It would have been the 26th wedding anniversary for her and her husband David, who was stabbed to death near a pizza restaurant at Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue in July 2002.

His murder, Rosenzweig said, left her and her family "navigating uncharted waters," dealing with "shock, trauma and adversity. Our family structure has been shattered."

God, she said, has given the surviving members of her family "a difficult challenge, a difficult journey."

She said they have been helped by the community, rabbis, colleagues, the children's schools, police, the media, health professionals and family, who have all offered comfort and security.

Ultimately, she said, what has sustained them is David, "my fan club, soulmate, role model, hero." His influence encouraged "[us to] be strong, to walk with dignity, to hold our heads high."

But Rosensweig also credited her faith with giving her the ability to persevere.

She wondered if the family would have the strength to live without the man she characterized as "sunshine, a mensch, a gentleman and a gentle man."

Where, she asked, was the starting point? Where could she turn?

She turned, she said, to the essence of what she is: the Torah and her Jewishness. "That is what connects us with God."

Jewishness, she said, is "my roots, my lineage, my heritage," as it is for every Jew. "We get our physical and spiritual genes from our ancestors, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob."

In her striving to connect with those spiritual genes, she said, she turned to the Psalms, pleading, along with the psalmist in Chapter 71, verse 20, "Thou who hast shown me many and grievous troubles, restore me to life again, and bring me up again from the depths of the earth."

Rosenzweig said she looked to the role models of the Jewish people throughout history: to Abraham and Sarah, who struggled with infertility; to Jacob, who was forced to leave his home and work 14 years for the hand of Rachel; to Hanna, who taught us how to pray; to Moses, who was forbidden to enter the land of Israel; to Ruth and to Rabbi Akiva; and to Esther Wachsman, whose son Nachshon was murdered by Arab terrorists.

"These heroes and heroines guide me."

Rosenzweig said "we nurture our soul by determination and prayer. But that is most difficult when God's face is hidden."

That, she said, is when one's belief in a divine master plan comes into play.

But accepting that there is such a plan, she said, "requires personal spiritual growth. It requires praying and searching."

Even though we are aware God is in our life, she said, we still need a support network to advise us, to guide us, and to laugh and cry with us.

"You have to recognize when you need a lifeline and allow yourself to reach out to other people."

Most of all, she said, it is our duty to know who we are and what we stand for.

"It is our high task to know and sanctify God – that's our role as Jews."

Her voice breaking, she said, "We thank God for blessing us with David."

As she left the podium, she was greeted with hugs and sobs from her mother and mother-in-law, tears that were also reflected on the faces of audience members.

Speaking softly and with tears running down his cheeks, Rabbi Avraham Plotkin, spiritual leader of Chabad of Markham, praised David for "influencing people in the community in a quiet way, by being a mensch even in the business world.

"People like him break down barriers between people," he said.

Elizabeth Plaut showed 'simple decency'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Obituary

Elizabeth Plaut, the wife of Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut, rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom Temple, died last week after a long illness. She was 93.

Plaut was born in New York, a fifth generation American. She earned several advanced degrees, including one in zoology, and was interested in literary matters, and the arts. She was a published author.

Rabbi Plaut, her husband of 65 years, said she had an especially keen social conscience. "Injustice riled her. When she got involved, she didn't let go until she had made her point."

Very few people, he said, "have that kind of persistence."

His success in life and in the rabbinate, he said, was largely due to her "guidance, help and encouragement. She was a wonderful wife."

Holy Blossom senior rabbi John Moscowitz said in his eulogy that Plaut was a woman "without pretence or guile, straightforward, unwilling to speak ill of others."

He spoke of her "surprising sense of humour," and her "simple decency," as well as her kindness and genuine interest in other people.

Most of all, he said, "she loved to laugh, to dance and sing. She had that great sparkle and that wonderful ease about her, with herself and with us."

In addition to her husband, she is survived by her son Rabbi Jonathan Plaut and his wife Carol, daughter Judith Plaut, four grandchildren and a great-grandchild.

Cyberspace and holy space

By RACHEL TURKIENICZ

Midrashic
Moments

The Jewish High Holy Days have arrived, and many Jews who do not regularly visit a synagogue make an effort to be there during this time. This raises the question of how a modern Jew finds a meaningful connection with prayer. For those people who pray routinely, the question of finding meaning is somewhat different than for those who pray less often.

I am not referring to spontaneous prayer that bursts forth from our hearts in certain circumstances, but rather to the ancient prayers that are embodied within the siddur or machzor that often seem impenetrable to a modern person who is not used to expressing himself or herself in that way. Yet within the modern world, there is an interesting parallel that many of us use daily.

The computer has brought the world to our doorsteps. It is not a one-way mode of communication as it first was, but with the Internet, e-mail and cyber communication, we can express ourselves with countless unseen partners. In order to avail ourselves of this mode of communication, we had to learn to master the keyboard. Without this mastery, we would resort to the "hunt and peck" typing technique, which becomes frustrating and inevitably stifles what we want to say. By mastering the vehicle of communication and the skill involved, we can express ourselves freely.

Likewise we must master the siddur/machzor as the vehicle that facilitates our communication. The difference lies in our mindset. We feel challenged and accomplished when we master a new technology, but we are not as challenged to master an "old" technology.

There is a language that is particular to the Internet, and we learn it as we go. Emotions and messages are conveyed through abbreviations that are impenetrable to the uninitiated. For example, "lol" means "laughing out loud;" "brb" means "be right back;" "9" means someone else is in the room while "99" means the coast is clear. One of my favourites is "mros" which means "mother reading over shoulder." Likewise, prayer has its code and its underlying meanings for some phrases, which may seem impenetrable to the uninitiated.

When talking with someone on the Internet, we assume there is a receiver of our message at the other end. We also assume there will be a lag in their response, since we understand the workings of computer technology and realize that even fibre optics can take their time. The lack of an immediate response does not automatically make us conclude that no one heard our message. We are willing to wait.

Yet with prayer, we expect an immediate response, even though when we truly question whether we understand the process involved in Divine intervention or response, we must admit we do not.

Of course this is a superficial comparison, since prayer in its true sense transcends even cyberspace. On the Internet, I am communicating with an unseen person. In prayer, I am communicating with an unseen Creator. In prayer, there is a true meeting rather than a virtual one.

The midrash tells us that when God speaks of receiving our prayers, He says: "I have no joy in the world like the joy in that hour when their eyes are lifted to Me on high and My eyes meet their eyes."

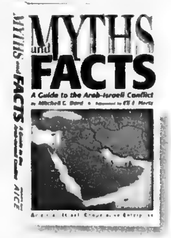
We use the Internet routinely every day. The more we engage with it, the more we learn, the more we master, the more we express. Perhaps we should give prayer half that chance.

Early Zionists gave up most of the land

MYTH:

The Palestinians are being asked to accept only 22 per cent of "Palestine" for their state, while Israel keeps 78 per cent.

FACT:



The government of Israel has agreed to a two-state solution to the conflict with the Palestinians. Once Israel agreed to give the Palestinians the independence they say they want, they shifted their complaint to the size of the state they were being offered. Many "moderates," such as Hanan Ashrawi, who say they can coexist with Israel, have said that Israel is doing the Palestinians no favours by offering them a state in the disputed territories because it is asking them to accept a state in only 22 per cent of "Palestine," while Israel keeps 78 per cent. This is a very convincing point to show the unfairness of the Palestinians' plight and to suggest Israel's peace overtures are niggardly – that is, unless you know the history of the region and recognize that the truth is exactly the reverse.

During the Ottoman Empire, after World War I, Palestine included not only Israel and the West Bank, but also all of modern Jordan. It is Israel, including the West Bank and Gaza Strip, that is only 22 per cent of that territory. If Israel were to withdraw completely from the West Bank and Gaza, it would possess only about 18 per cent. From Israel's perspective, the early Zionists gave up 82 per cent of the land of Israel. In fact, by accepting the United Nation's partition resolution in 1947, before the Arab states attacked and tried to destroy the nascent Israeli state, Israel was prepared to accept only about 12 per cent.

Meanwhile, of the approximately nine million Palestinians worldwide, three-fourths live in historic Palestine.

MYTH:

Palestinians interested in peace and preventing terror are respected and allowed freedom of speech by Palestinian authorities.

FACT:

One of the principal deterrents to speaking out against Palestinian irredentism and terror in the Palestinian Authority (PA) is the threat of being murdered. By the end of the first intifadah in the early 1990s, more Palestinians were killed by their fellow Palestinians than died in clashes with Israeli security forces. Since the current uprising began in September 2000, Palestinians have again used intimidation and murder to try to prevent dissent. Usually those seeking peace or an end to terror are labelled "collaborators" and, if they are lucky, arrested by the PA. The unlucky ones are murdered, often in grisly and public ways, such as by being strung up from lampposts in public squares, to send the message that a similar fate awaits anyone who dares cross those seeking Israel's destruction.

There are no exact figures for the number of Palestinians killed in the internecine war, but a State Department human rights report said that 250 alleged collaborators had been arrested, and civilians had killed at least 35 in 2002 alone. The Israeli human rights group B'tselem recorded 142 Palestinian deaths between September 2000 and Aug. 26, 2003, while a Palestinian human rights group said 76 were executed and another 22 murdered between September 2000 and October 2002. The International Policy Institute for Counter-Terrorism recorded 303 Palestinians killed by their own side. In its 2003 report on the PA, Amnesty International said, "Scores of Palestinians" had been unlawfully killed and that the PA "consistently failed to investigate these killings and none of the perpetrators was brought to justice."

Rosh Hashanah shofar

A hush falls over the congregation. The shofar is raised and the first blast – Tekiah – is sounded. The shofar is one of Judaism's most famous symbols and is responsible for some of its most profound writings. Today, some insights into the shofar from the Jewish Highway.

The Jewish Highway

Rav Saadiah Gaon gives 10 reasons for blowing the shofar on Rosh Hashanah. [http://www.ohr.org.il/special/roshhash/shofar.htm] Among them: "Rosh Hashanah is the day that commemorates the creation of the world and it is described as the 'coronation' of God. As it is customary to sound a trumpet at a king's coronation, so we blow the shofar on Rosh Hashanah. By blowing the shofar we recognize the 'purpose' of the creation."

Virtual Jerusalem has a wonderful mini-site about the shofar. [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/rosh/shofar.htm] There's a survey of other times the shofar is sounded, such as introducing the jubilee year. During the Middle Ages, Jews also blew the shofar to mark the beginning of Shabbat or to announce deaths, fasts and even excommunications. In more recent times, Israel has used it to inaugurate new presidents.

For thoughts on the symbolism of the shofar, see Rabbi Harold Kushner [http://www.jewishsf.com/bk000922/sfcyberlinks.shtml], Aish HaTorah [http://aish.com/holidays/the_high_holidays/last/shofar.htm] and some shofar-related stories from Chabad-Lubavitch. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?H221155E5]

At the Torahtots site, you can find a Shofar-based puzzle and drawings which you can print out and colour. [http://www.torahtots.com/holidays/rosh/roshclr.htm]

For a Jew, the need to hear the shofar can be extremely powerful. Rabbi Eli Hecht tells the heartbreaking story of how a rabbi risked his life to sound a shofar in Auschwitz for hundreds of doomed children. [http://www.shamash.org/listarchives/jewish-music/940831] And there's the story of how some Conversos, Spanish Jews who officially converted to Christianity, were able to listen to the Shofar on Rosh Hashanah without provoking the ire of the Inquisition. [http://sephardiconnect.com/Rosh.htm]

David Bar-Tzur has tried to represent the sound of the shofar for the deaf. [http://www.rit.edu/~dabdis/jush/rh/shofar.html] "The way I represent the sounding of the shofar is to first fingerspell the type of shofar blast that is called out then sign SHOFAR, that is the two S hands are held at the mouth. For the Tekiah, I bow my head at the beginning of the blast and raise it again as the blast ends."

Sure you can buy a shofar at your local Judaica shop or on the Internet [http://www.1st-choice-shofar.com/], but why not make your own? All you need is the horn of a kosher animal: goat, ram, antelope, gazelle, bighorn sheep or ibex. (No cows please. Too much of a connection to Exodus' golden calf and the sin of idol worship.) Then get an electric drill, soft wire, Borax and a coping saw. Presto! Your own home-made shofar. [http://www.geocities.com/afinkle221/making/making_shofar.html]

The previous page is part of the best shofar site I have come across. Created by Arthur L. Finkle, the Shofar Sounders Web page has sections about the sounds of the Shofar, as well as biblical and mishnaic citations. But what really impressed me were his detailed tips on how to blow a shofar. Some recommendations: keep your lips moist and your jaw pushed forward. And don't forget to use your diaphragm. One last bit of advice: No professional musician would dream of picking up an instrument and blasting out a note without a proper warm-up, and the same goes for the shofar. [http://www.geocities.com/afinkle221/]

Once you're warmed up, MyJewishLearning.com has created a very useful site that not only explains the significance of the various shofar sounds, it plays them for you. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?T2F0135E5]

And if you need human guidance, don't despair. If you find yourself in the Boston area, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology offers a one-day Shofar-blowing course. [http://student.mit.edu/searchiap/iap-904.html] Sorry, you don't get a credit for taking this course – no earthly credit, that is.

May you and your family have a Shanah Tovah Umetukah, a Good and Sweet New Year.

Confronting history and tshuvah

I recently met with the consul of the Republic of Poland stationed in Toronto and with Jerzy Kropiwnicki, the mayor of Lodz, Poland. Kropiwnicki outlined his plan for a commemorative event to mark the 60th anniversary of the last deportations from the Lodz ghetto, which took place Aug. 30, 1944. He expressed his shame that nothing had been done over the past 60 years to even acknowledge that Jews had once lived in Lodz.

Rabbinic Reflections

Neither he nor the consul, however, could admit to any Polish wrongdoing during World War II. No acknowledgement was made of the fact that after the war, many Jews returned home, only to be murdered by their Polish neighbours. The president of the Canadian Polish Congress has actually suggested that although there were some unfortunate "accidents," there are good and bad people everywhere and one should not therefore make any generalizations about Poles and Polish attitudes.

According to him, each incident stands in isolation from every other incident, and no useful conclusions can be drawn from random acts committed by bad people. The past, then, cannot teach us anything because there is nothing relevant to learn – only that there are good and bad people in the world, and one can't do anything about that. For him, the past has no relevant meaning, because no overarching pattern or lesson can be drawn from it. Instead, life is filled with good people and bad people, and a lot of unfortunate "accidents" – nothing more.

To the rabbis, however, history is not a series of isolated, disconnected "accidents." Rather, a pattern is there to be uncovered. In Tractate Rosh Hashanah, Rabbi Eliezer reflects upon the past redemption of the Jews from Egypt in the month of Nisan. He argues that the future redemption will be in Tishrei based on the occurrence of the word "shofar" both in reference to Nisan and in reference to the future redemption.

His careful reading of the text accomplishes several things: he identifies a critical issue in the past (our redemption from Egypt); he identifies a structure in the Torah ("shofar" appearing in reference to both that past redemption and the future redemption); and he draws a conclusion about the future redemption of the Jews (that it will take place in Tishrei).

The redemptive power of history lies in looking for a pattern or an overall structure. This is the lesson of Rabbi Eliezer, who looks to our history, finds a structure and teaches about redemption in the future. The past is relevant and meaningful precisely because structure can be uncovered that gives insight into the present.

In this penitential season, Rabbi Eliezer's insight teaches that the essence of the process of tshuvah is in examining history and looking for a pattern. We must look to our own individual and personal histories and examine them openly and self-critically, looking for patterns that will reveal where we went wrong.

Only when we can see our shortcomings will we be able to address them and improve ourselves. To pursue tshuvah effectively, an honest and self-critical examination of history is necessary, with careful attention to finding the patterns that lend meaning to the past.

Home health care services are a vital but sorely underfunded part of Ontario's health care system. In 1998 the Ontario government committed to increase its annual funding for home and community care by $551.8 million by 2006. So far just over half of this amount has been allotted with practically no increases over the past two years. Consequently more than 115,000 vulnerable seniors and persons with debilitating diseases have lost services completely and the number of hours of service overall has declined by 30 percent.

Do you agree to support an immediate infusion into the home health care system of at least $125 million with the remaining $125 million added by 2004 to fulfill the 1998 commitment?

Many municipalities in Ontario have recorded hate crime activity in their jurisdictions. The city of Toronto alone has reported more than 200 hate crime incidents in each year since 1998. These hateful acts are directed against many groups and severely damage the multicultural fabric of our society.

Do you support the establishment of a provincial hate crimes registry that would allow all law enforcement agencies to share information regarding this socially-damaging criminal activity? Further to this, do you support the full utilization of the criminal code of Canada and the Ontario Human Rights code to prosecute individuals who incite hatred against identifiable groups?

Candidate Questionnaire

Between 15 and 20 percent of Ontario children presently live in poverty. The incidence of child poverty in the Jewish community is not dissimilar to that of the larger society. Today the average price of a two-bedroom apartment in Ontario is $883 but a family of three living on social assistance receives only $554 to cover the cost of rent. Without enough money to pay for basic needs, families must make the terrible decision whether to pay the rent or feed the kids.

Do you agree to support substantially increasing the shelter allowance component of social assistance to more accurately reflect true housing costs?

The provincial government has designated $14.4 million annually for health support services for children attending independent and home schools. Because of rigid eligibility guidelines which do not permit special needs children in independent schools or in home schooling with language, developmental and communication challenges to access these funds the situation two years into the program is that only about one-third of these dollars is actually being spent.

Do you agree to support the relaxation of these restrictive eligibility requirements so that more special needs students can benefit from the unused portion of the $14.4 million budget?

Hate Crime activity has spread from the streets to the internet and now takes on many different disguises.

Do you support increases to the operating budgets of the major police services in Ontario (e.g. Toronto, London, Hamilton, Windsor, Ottawa) to expand and/or develop the capability/expertise of hate crime and anti-terrorist units?

דער שופר — אַ ראש־השנה סימבאָל

פון ד״ר פרעד וויינבערג

דער שופר איז דער הויפט־סימבאָל פון ראש־השנה, ווי דער אָנהייב פון אַ ניי יאָר, פונקט ווי דער סדר־טעלער איז סימבאָליש פאַר פסח און דער אתרוג און לולב איז סימבאָליש פאַר סוכות. פאַקטיש געפינען זיי זיך אַלע אין דער ייִדישער געשיכטע, ווי למשל דער מגן־דוד. אויף אַלטע, אויסגעגראָבענע פאָדלאָגעס פון שילן פון ביבלישע צייטן, געפינט מען אָפט דעם שופר ווי אַן אַרטיסטישן מאָטיוו, אויסגעקריצט אין די קאַכלען פונעם דיל.

אין דער אמתן איז אין חומש ראש־השנה נישט געשילדערט ווי אַן אָנהייב פון אַ ניי יאָר, נאָר איז דערמאָנט ווי אַ „יום תרועה״. איז טאַקע דאָס שופר בלאָזן באַקאַנט ווי די צענטראַלע צערעמאָניע אין די ימים נוראים.

דער שופר איז אַ האָרן פון אַ באַראַן (אין ענגליש אַ ram). דאָס דערמאָנט אין דער עקידה, ווען אברהם אָבינו האָט געטוישט אַ ווידער אָנשטאָט זיין זון יצחק. דאָך מעג מען באַנוצן אַ האָרן פון וועלכער נישט איז כשרער חיה, אַחוץ פון אַן אָקס אָדער פון אַ קו, ווייל די דאָזיקע בהמות דערמאָנען דעם ייִדישן פאָלק וועגן גרעסטן חטא פון די בני ישראל: דאָס באַשאַפן דעם „עגל הזהב״ — דעם גאָלדענעם קאַלב — כדי אים צו פאַרגעטערן.

נישט גרינג איז צו בלאָזן דעם שופר, דעריבער האַלט ביי זיך דער בעל־תוקע — דער שופר־בלאָזער — אַ צווייטן שופר אין רעזערוו. לעבן אים, ביי די תפילות, שטייט אויך אַ מקריא, וואָס לייענט אַרויס די נעמען פון די שופרות, כדי דער שופר־בלאָזער זאָל נישט מוזן געדענקען דעם סדר פון די תקיעות. די משנה באַשרייבט אַ לאַנגן בלאָז ווי די תקיעה; די תרועה איז אַ וויינענדיק, פלאַטערדיקער קלאַנג פון ניין סטאַקאַטאָ נאָטן; די שברים, ווי זיי הייסן, זיינען דריי צעבראָכענע נאָטן, וואָס גייען שנעל איינע נאָך דער אַנדערער.

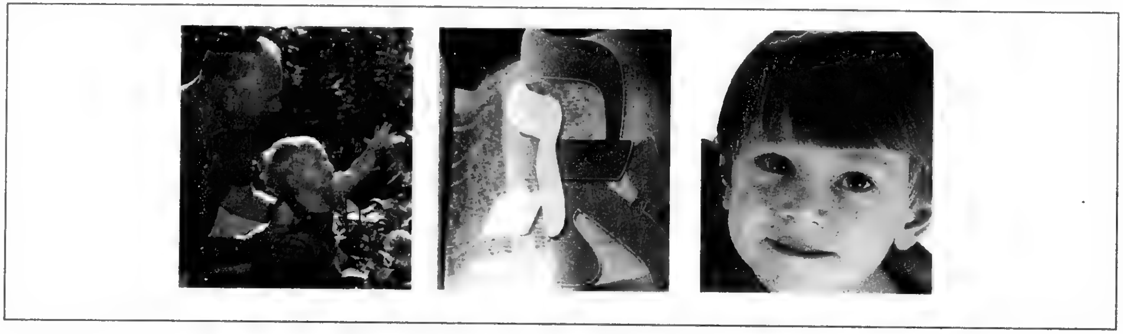
THE TIME FOR REFLECTION IS NOW. THE TIME FOR ACTION IS OCTOBER 2!



OCTOBER 2 is the date of our Provincial Election. It gives each of us a chance as individuals to acknowledge the good-will shown towards our community by the Government.

The Government has taken steps to rectify the historic unequal treatment of our children by giving us the Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC).

In that effort, the Government has helped our community provide a more affordable Jewish education for our children to ensure Jewish continuity.

The Government has given us parental choice so that WE can decide what is best for OUR children.

Dalton McGuinty and the Liberals want to take the Tax Credit away from us. Dalton McGuinty has said, "All of Ontario knows where I stand when it comes to your private school tax credit: we will cancel it..."(Hansard, Oct. 22, 2002).

If Dalton McGuinty and the Liberals win, they will remove the Tax Credit forever COSTING EVERY DAY SCHOOL PARENT THOUSANDS OF DOLLARS PER YEAR. The Liberals will hurt so many in our community!

WE NOW HAVE A UNIQUE OPPORTUNITY TO ENSURE THAT THIS FUNDING WILL CONTINUE INTO THE FUTURE.

Get out and vote for the candidates who will protect our Tax Credit. Vote for those who care about the right of our parents to choose. Vote for an end to discrimination. Vote for Jewish continuity. Vote!

Muslim author calls for reform

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

In her new book, The Trouble With Islam: A Wake-Up Call for Honesty and Change, Irshad Manji asks the followers of Islam to revisit the basic foundations of their faith.

Manji questions the stubborn anti-Semitic streak in Muslim societies, the continuous oppression of women and the manner in which homosexuals are treated – with ostracism or death – even though the Qu'ran clearly states that "everything God made is excellent."

The author also asks why Muslims are "all being held hostage by what's happening between the Palestinians and the Israelis?"

Irshad Manji

The book is written in the form of a letter addressed to the author's fellow Muslims and encourages the readers to start an Islamic reformation through critical analysis and honest debate. And while many will undoubtedly criticize Manji, a feminist and gay activist, for not being a true Muslim, the challenge posed by reformers like Manji will inevitably cause mainstream Muslims to rethink and justify their orthodoxy.

But Manji doesn't limit her questions to followers of Islam. She critically suggests that "non-Muslims do the world no favours by pushing moral mute buttons as soon as Muslims start speaking."

With honesty and candour, the author addresses the fine line between the promotion of diverse perspectives and the danger of accepting undemocratic, racist voices within a pluralistic, tolerant world. After distinguishing between individualism, an "I'm out for myself approach" to life, and individuality, "I'm myself, and my society benefits from that uniqueness," Manji challenges those in Europe who are tolerant of Muslim imams who pass fatwas on writers. She asks them to consider whether they also believe that the 16 million Muslims living in Europe are capable of contributing to society as individuals.

"The question is not whether they're capable, but whether you believe they are," she writes, adding that to decide they are not capable can be been seen as a reverse kind of racism that stems from low expectations.

Manji wonders why people who opposed the recent American war in Iraq are not demonstrating against Arab regimes "in which Sunni Muslim minorities control the Shia majorities."

She asks anti-globalization activists to respond to Rami Khouri, the Palestinian journalist who has pointed out that "independent, credible, civil society institutions are non-existent in most of the Persian Gulf, Syria, Iraq and Libya, and operate under heavy state controls in Sudan, Algeria, Tunisia and Yemen," and questions why colossal street demonstrations against the abuse of universal human freedoms are not being organized.

While Manji admits that Europe needs to guard against the anti-Arab racism that grows from economic malaise, she is also cautious about the racism that comes from overcompensating.

"Depicting Zionists as European imperialists or Nazis isn't the way to redeem your afflicted consciences. Supporting human rights for all is."

The mainstream Islamic muzzle on free speech and the pursuit of equal rights are discussed with savvy and intelligence, and Manji's sincere cry for change brings a drop of optimism to a discussion filled with lies and innuendo.

Manji dismisses the usual western, romantic, tribal portrayals of desert-swept Arabia and looks at the historical background that led to the current Arab-centred stranglehold on Islamic thought. She then dares the world to begin a serious dialogue questioning the racism and intimidation that permeate the mainstream Muslim world.

The author is also critical of Israel and some of the extremist views and racist policies that have driven political agendas. However, she reminds her readers that "these folks are lightweights in contemporary Judaism. Infuriating, but marginal."

With creative intelligence, the book quickly moves from newly named concepts, such as "foundamentalism," the founding moment that has committed the Islamic world to Arabian supremacy, to the older tradition of ijtihad, Islam's lost practice of independent thinking.

The book, which is available only in soft cover, has been released in Germany, and is due to be released in the United States and France in January. Its light, breezy language makes the issues accessible and restores a contemporary, honest level of discussion to debates on the Middle East. The reader is left wondering which aspect of the book will anger radicals in the Muslim world most – revealing their anti-Semitism or pointing to their attitudes towards women and gays.

But for those of us who have yearned for equal playing fields and honest partners on issues ranging from suicide bombing, Muslim anti-Semitism and homophobia to Israel's attempts to pass discriminatory legislation and the legitimacy of targeted killings, there is now someone to debate with.

Irshad Manji addresses anti-Semitism in new book

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Irshad Manji, 34, is an award-winning TV personality, author and media entrepreneur. She hosts Big Ideas, a TV program for university and college students. Before that, she hosted and produced QueerTelevision, the world's first show on commercial TV directed at both gay and straight audiences.

Manji, who was the first humanities student to win the Governor General's Gold Medal for top graduate, has participated in campus debates and Jewish discussion groups across Canada.

Her first book, Risking Utopia: On the Edge of a New Democracy, chronicles how young people are redefining democracy to make it more inclusive of diversity. Her recent book, The Trouble With Islam, describes why she has become a Muslim reformist.

CJN: As a Muslim, why did you decide to address anti-Semitism in your book?

Manji: I dealt with the whole issue of anti-Semitism because it is so irrational. While all of us have to make choices in what we wear or what route we take, the decision to hate Jews is utterly illogical.

I remember walking into my Grade 9 English class in Richmond, B.C., and seeing swastikas all over the blackboard because the teacher was Jewish. It didn't matter that he was a great teacher. It struck me that Jews were continuously being tarred. There was no logical reason to explain it, and that I can't abide.

CJN: Aren't you worried that your views will be criticized and that many will claim you are in the back pocket of the so-called Zionists?

> 'People already say that I'm a self-hating Muslim, but if that were true, I would have simply ditched my faith'

Manji: That is already happening. But I'll absorb those insults if it will convince others to focus attention on the arguments. People already say that I'm a self-hating Muslim, but if that were true, I would have simply ditched my faith. Instead, I've spent the past 20 years away from the glare of the camera, educating myself about the Qu'ran and Hadith (the compilation of the teachings, sayings and actions of the prophet Mohammed).

CJN: You now travel with a security guard. Are you afraid?

Manji: I have received a death threat on my e-mail, but I'm resolute about what I'm doing and the need for it to be done. However, I also believe in being prepared.

CJN: Are you optimistic about changing the hearts and minds of the Muslim world?

Manji: Muslim students are already flocking to speak to me on college and university campuses as the Muslim voice on television. They tell me that they're glad someone is finally talking about diversity and reform in the Muslim world. They say they use me to kick off discussions with their parents. And I don't mind being the whipping girl.

CJN: Maclean's Canada named you a Leader for Tomorrow and categorized you a "dreamer." Cynics will say that your following is minimal and that true believers will dismiss you. How would you respond to those who say you're simply dreaming if you believe you can reform Islam?

Manji: All I can say, is that if my e-mail is any indication, many Muslims and non-Muslims share my dream. I'm overwhelmed with positive feedback from Muslims expressing relief and gratitude for a voice of reason. In the end, it's dreamers who change the day.

A century after his arrival in Saint John, N.B., from his native Lithuania, 82 of Marcus Freedman's descendants gathered in Halifax for a three-day celebration of their family's roots.

His descendants, who are spread out across North America, came from as far west as Laguna Beach, Calif., and Victoria, B.C., and as far east as Israel, for the recent three-day reunion. The oldest relative was 92 and the youngest was six months. Among those who attended was Myra Freeman, the lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia.

Mary Ann Freedman, 52, attended the reunion with her husband Billy Hitzig. Like many others in her clan, Freedman left Saint John to go to university in Ontario and never moved back.

Freedman was delighted by the reunion and amazed at the turnout. The highlight, she said, was reconnecting with old cousins and meeting new ones.

"We still have a really tight family circle even though we're all over the world," she said. Despite not seeing some relatives for more than 20 years, she said they "picked up from where they left off."

As a child, Freedman and her two siblings grew up next door to her four cousins, the Kovens, in Saint John. She remembers their two families did everything together, running across the lawn from one house to the other.

"We were almost like one family," she said. "My uncle drove us all to school in the morning, and my father picked us all up from Hebrew school in the afternoon."

The idea for a family reunion began when a relative began compiling the family tree. One of the cousins thought it would be a great to have a get-together, and it "snowballed" from there, said Marcia Koven in a phone interview from Saint John.

Koven, 76, and several other clan members spent almost a year organizing the event, which was held in Halifax because Saint John has no kosher caterer. The elder ladies in the family also made sweets and pastries and brought them on the four-hour drive from Saint John to Halifax.

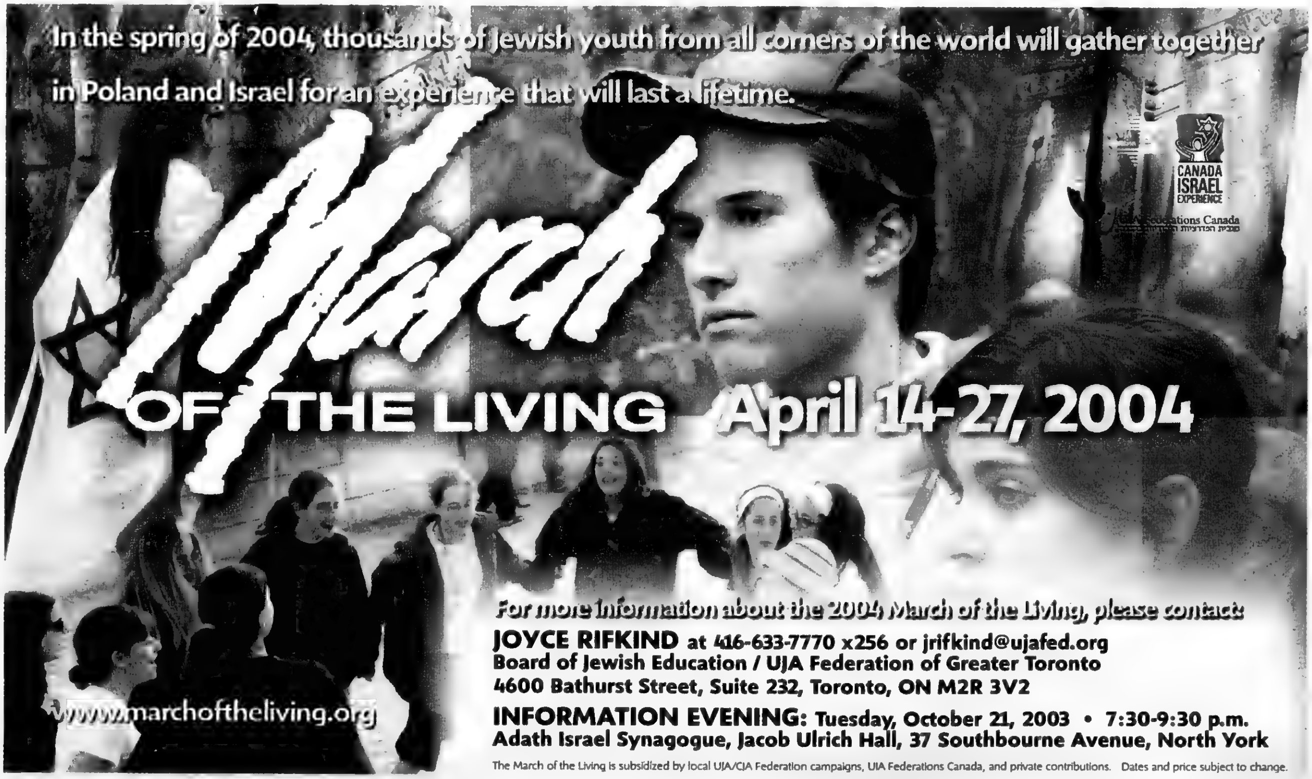
"We got to the hotel [where the reunion was held] and saw a feast!" said Freedman. "It was a major eat-a-thon." Among the events were a picnic, an afternoon tea and a meal at Government House, the official residence of the lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia.

Koven's favourite moment was the Havdalah service. After Shabbat, the three generations of the Freedman clan joined hands and formed a circle. "They said, 'This is the family circle,'" Koven said. "It was so beautiful. When I close my eyes and think about it, I could cry."

The Freedman family recently gathered in Halifax for a three day reunion. Inset: (from left) Myra Freeman, lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia; Marcia Koven, who organized the event; and Janet Holtzman.

Saint John was one of the major entry points into North America. Many families passed through it on the way to other parts of the country, but a few, like the Freedmans, stayed. Koven thinks almost 300 Jewish families lived in Saint John when she was growing up. Today, she guesses no more than 30 remain.

"It's one of the diminishing Jewish communities of the Diaspora," Koven said.



In the spring of 2004, thousands of Jewish youth from all corners of the world will gather together in Poland and Israel for an experience that will last a lifetime.

Globe shows flawed reasoning on Arafat

According to Reports

By

PAUL MICHAELS

Debating the course of Israeli-Palestinian relations tests everyone's capacity to think clearly and consistently. This was particularly obvious last week in media commentaries about Israel's implied threat to deport Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat after two more horrific terrorist attacks.

In its Sept. 8 editorial, "The wrong man quit," the Globe and Mail concluded, "If Mr. Arafat cannot step aside, he should step down." The paper's Sept. 13 editorial, "Wrong way to deal with Yasser Arafat," argued that a forced exile of Arafat would be folly. There is no inconsistency in this. The Globe, recognizing what a destructive force Arafat is to the aspirations of his own people, urged only that he relinquish power, not that he be physically removed from the West Bank.

Yet, there is an inconsistency in the Globe's line of reasoning. While acknowledging (in the second editorial) that even though "Behind the scenes… [Arafat] continued to wield considerable power," it argues that Israel's threatened expulsion catapulted him back to "centre stage," with the result that "he is no longer sidelined" and lasting Mideast peace "is all the more elusive."

Arafat did indeed exercise considerable power from his Ramallah compound. He forced the resignation of former PA prime minister Mahmoud Abbas. Then, Arafat quickly neutralized Abbas' successor, Ahmed Quereia, by unifying security services under his National Security Council to prevent any operations against terrorist groups like Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

It follows, then, that Arafat was never "sidelined" and so peace is no more elusive today because of Israel's controversial pronouncement.

The Globe, it must be emphasized, is quite sensitive to Israel's acute level of frustration with Arafat and the degree to which he has been a deceiver. (Robert Fulford depicted him with laser-like accuracy as a "sacred monster" in the National Post on Sept. 13). But let's not be under any illusions: as long as Arafat remains in the disputed territories, he will continue to control Palestinian affairs, no matter who is appointed prime minister, and that means any progress toward peace is virtually impossible.

Yes, if Israel were to expel Arafat, things might be equally bad, and perhaps even worse in the short run. But this only highlights Israel's dilemma: there is arguably no satisfactory solution in the foreseeable future.

On the subject of terrorism and clarity of thought, here's part of an exchange between the Toronto Star's Richard Gwyn and University of Toronto professor Janice Stein on TVOntario's Studio 2 (Sept.10) that is not to be missed.

Steve Paikin (host): "How will we know when we've won [the war on terrorism]?"

Gwyn: "The real sign we're winning [is] when you get a sense that the Arab world, the Islamic world, is turning away from the use – to the extent that it is doing it, but some parts of it are doing it – of terror and killing as a political instrument…"

Stein: "… If you look at the history of suicide bombings… they began… in Sri Lanka. The Tamil Tigers used it, but that was not an artifact of Islam…

"I don't accept the association between Islam and extreme forms of terrorism… There are other groups in society who will avail themselves [of terrorism], because it is so easy to do now."

Gwyn: "You can't confuse the Tamil Tigers, even if they get hold of the bomb, with Islamic terrorists. I mean Islamic terrorists have a reason in their minds, a justification – for attacking us."

Stein: "So do the Tamil Tigers."

Gwyn: "No, the Tamil Tigers want to get the Sri Lankans. They don't want to get us."

Current Mideast violence compared to 1948 war

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel is fighting "a new war of independence," says Col. Miri Eisen, a former Israeli military spokesperson.

Eisen likened the current Palestinian uprising to the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, "which was about our right to exist as a Jewish, democratic state."

She said the Palestinians have succeeded in persuading most western European countries to question Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state.

"We didn't think it was an issue," said Eisen, suggesting the Israeli government was blindsided by the success of a Palestinian public relations campaign to delegitimize Israel.

But today it is "a core issue" that Israel has begun to address, said Eisen, who dealt with the media after Operation Defensive Shield in the spring of 2002.

Israel launched the massive military operation to re-occupy the West Bank after a series of devastating Palestinian suicide bombings.

Eisen said the "Palestinian narrative" to win hearts and minds is "simple and very coherent."

The Palestinians assume the role of victims and claim Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza is the sole cause of Palestinian violence against Israelis.

Until about 1½ years ago, Israel defended its occupation, said Eisen, who was in Toronto on a Canadian speaking tour on behalf of UJA Federation.

But in a shift of strategy since the terror attacks of Sept. 11, Israel now embraces a two-state solution, acknowledges the downside of the occupation and emphasizes the Palestinians' association with terrorism, she said.

Israel does not necessarily have to win the public relations battle. "But we can't afford to lose it."

In the court of public opinion, Israel should always stress its identity as a Jewish democracy, Eisen said.

"We have every right to be a Jewish democracy," she said, alluding to attempts by some Palestinians to convince the world that Israel should be a secular state, a state of all its Jewish, Muslim and Christian citizens.

On university campuses, Israel has failed to deliver an important message, said Eisen, who immigrated to Israel with her family from San Francisco in 1971 when she was nine years old

"We're not giving students, the educated next generation, a basic understanding of what Israel is. To them, the Six Day War is ancient history."

Eisen said Israel seeks a Palestinian partner prepared to recognize its status as a Jewish state.

"With [Palestinian Authority President Yasser] Arafat, we have no common ground."

She said Arafat does not accept Israel's existence as a democratic, Jewish state. "We can't negotiate with him."

As long as he remains PA president, the peace process will be at a standstill, she said.

Describing Arafat as an irrelevant figure, she called Israel's recent decision to "remove" him from power as a measure to give Israelis some hope he will be replaced by more moderate leaders.

Eisen accused Arafat of planning the intifadah for more than a year before its eruption in September 2000.

"He waited for the right moment," she said, referring to the Arab riots that broke out after Ariel Sharon's much-publicized visit to the Temple Mount in eastern Jerusalem.

The Palestinians thought Israel would not be able to withstand the violence touched off by the intifadah.

"But they are amazed by our stamina, determination and righteousness."

The intifadah, however, has brought anti-Semitic feelings to the fore, she noted.

For the majority of Israelis, the sense of isolation triggered by the conflict has been the hardest pill to swallow.

"Before, we were part of the world. But now, we sense we're alone," she said in a reference to the sharp decline in tourism in the past three years. "There is a sense nobody wants to come here any more."

Jewish tourists, though, have ameliorated the isolation felt by Israelis.

Eisen expressed unhappiness with Canada's Mideast policy, saying it is somewhere between that of the United States and Europe.

She predicted that terrorism will come to Canada and other countries.

"It's going to happen, at mega levels also."

Watchdog slams hatred in Palestinian media

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — The next great looming global crisis is the creation of a new generation of suicide bombers, says Itamar Marcus, director of the independent Jerusalem-based organization Palestinian Media Watch (PMW).

Speaking Sept. 16 at the Agudath Israel Congregation in Ottawa to mark the start of the city's 2004 UJA campaign, Marcus presented a series of short video clips to show how the Palestinian Authority (PA) teaches children that Jews are murderers, that Israel has no right to exist and not to fear, but lust after, shahadah (martyrdom).

"If there's a whole generation of kids who can just get on a plane like those Saudis did and fly into the World Trade Center… we have the potential for the foundation of world suicide terrorists," Marcus said.

Sitting in the 300-person crowd and taking notes was Canadian Alliance MP Stockwell Day, his party's senior foreign affairs critic, who called the presentation "gripping and depressing."

"On the positive side, it calls people to action. It gets MPs to see what's going on," Day said.

He said his notes were in preparation for an informal meeting between Marcus and MPs on Sept. 18. Day said informal discussions normally garner responses from four or five MPs, but almost 20 expressed interest.

"Truth is a powerful wedge," he said.

Marcus said there are two distinct worlds in the PA – the English language world and the Arabic language world, and PA officials convey different messages to each.

"They take small truths and expand them to terrible lies and libel," Marcus said.

PMW, founded in 1996 to monitor Palestinian Arabic media and schoolbooks, has uncovered hundreds of examples of hatred of Jews and disdain for Israel being preached to Palestinian children through textbooks and other media such as music videos, Marcus said.

In one of the videos he played, a young man sings a farewell message to his father. In another, an attractive female singer dances in military garb, telling youths not to fear martyrdom.

"These messages are running hours a day to Palestinian children," he said, adding that Palestinian children believe dying for Allah is good and that polls have found that 80 per cent of them aspire to shahadah.

Marcus showed an interview with an 11-year-old girl, who, with a wide smile, said that, if given the choice of complete rights and freedoms or shahadah, she would choose shahadah.

Marcus said these messages appear all over Palestinian media. In one newspaper's sports section, for example, he said there was extensive coverage of a soccer tournament for 12- and 13-year-old boys that was named after Abd Al-Baset Odeh, the suicide bomber responsible for the terror attack on a Passover seder in a Netanya hotel in March 2002.

"It's the brother of the bomber that distributes the trophies," Marcus said.

Another common theme, Marcus said, is Holocaust denial. He showed recent clips from Sept. 8 on PA television, in which teachers said they don't teach the Holocaust because it's all lies.

As well, he said, PA religious and political leaders are often shown on television preaching violence against Jews and the utter denial of Israel's right to exist.

"There's no Dachau, no Auschwitz. [Jews are] an entity implanted as a cancer in our land," one "senior historian" said on television.

Following Marcus' presentation, UJA Campaign chair Robert Greenberg announced that the 2004 Ottawa campaign aims to raise $4.2 million, an increase of 15 per cent over last year.

Israeli DJ-VJ duo attracts 1,100 students

On Campus

National Jewish Campus Life, the Canada-Israel Experience (CIE), Hillel of Greater Toronto and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto co-hosted a Rosh Hashanah bash with Israeli DJ Lucky Lou and VJ Eitan Einwohner at Toronto's York Event theatre on Sept. 13 that attracted 1,100 people.

"Toronto's New Year's party set the stage for what will be happening in other Jewish student clusters across Canada," said Barbara Bank, national chair of Jewish Campus Life.

"As part of our initiative to inject greater enthusiasm and interest in Judaism and Israel, we went to the source and brought a piece of Israel to Canada."

Proceeds from the event will go to CIE's Mifgash (encounter) program, which helps link Israeli soldiers and Canadian Jews and solidify ties formed on Birthright Israel visits.

"Whether it was to reunite with friends from a past Birthright Israel trip, to hear a world renowned DJ from Tel Aviv or to taste an apple honey martini, our community came together like never before," said Ivy Ackerman, CIE Marketing Manager, who co-organized the event.

"To be standing in the middle of that room and to feel the energy circulating was an experience I'll never forget."

Lucky Lou and Einwohner were in Toronto as part of a cross-Canada tour.

The Centre for Jewish Studies at York University

A Challenging Environment for Growth and Continuity

MESSAGE FROM THE DIRECTOR

Professor Martin Lockshin, Director, Centre for Jewish Studies

It is customary for Jews to look back and take stock at the end of the Jewish year about the events of the past year. Sadly, 5763 was not an easy year for Jewish communities in Israel or in the Diaspora. Israelis were under attack physically. Outside of Israel, much to our surprise, antisemitism increased in many countries of the world. Now, in the final days of 5763, the situation in Israel in particular is depressing. Jews the world over have been wondering how to reverse these troubling trends and how to increase feelings of Jewish pride in these difficult times.

We at York's Centre for Jewish Studies believe that bringing knowledge of the Jewish past to both Jews and non-Jews is a useful way of strengthening the Jewish future. We teach the full array of Judaica offerings—from Bible to Philosophy to History and Literature—and try to cover all periods of the Jewish experience, with an emphasis on the contemporary.

We are proud that York students continue to study in Israel in numbers that are higher than virtually any other North American university. Recently York University signed a cooperation agreement with the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, expanding the areas of our cooperation and making it easier for the students in our Jewish Education program to get part of their training in Jerusalem.

There are unfortunately no quick fixes for many of the issues that beset the Jewish world. But Jews have always recognized that part of the solution lies in knowledge and study and dissemination of the truth. We hope to continue, with your help, to do this for many years to come.

"Takhel shanah veqilelotehah, tihal shanah uvirkhotehah—may the past year with all of its curses come to an end, and may a new year of blessing begin!"

Bubka – a treasure from mother

By BEV BERGMAN
CJN Staff

Every year since my two brothers and I have married and had our own homes and families, our mother has baked a wonderful bubka for us to eat after the Yom Kippur fast. She baked a minimum of three cakes, and each one took two days to create.

Her process began at least one month before Rosh Hashanah, and with each baking, we awaited the pronouncement of whether it was the best cake she ever baked or her worst flop!

The first mouthful of this wonderful yeast cake has always provided a warm feeling of our mother's love and offered a positive outlook toward a sweet new year. This will be our first Yom Kippur without her.

The kugel from my sister-in-law Marilyn is also a favourite for our break-the-fast meal.

MICKEY BISGOULD'S BUBKA

½ lb. butter
1 cup homogenized milk
2 packages yeast
3 tbsp. warm water
2 tbsp. flour
7 tbsp. sugar – divided
1 tsp. salt
4 egg yolks
3-3½ cups flour
4 egg whites

Filling:
1 cup brown sugar
½ cup walnuts
¼ cup raisins
1 tsp. cinnamon

Topping:
¼ cup brown sugar
¼ cup soft butter

Melt ½ lb. butter with 1 cup milk. Allow to cool.

Crumble yeast into large bowl. Add warm water and mix until yeast dissolves. Add 2 tbsp. flour and 2 tbsp. of the sugar. Let stand for 20 minutes.

Add melted butter-milk mixture, remaining 5 tbsp. sugar, salt, egg yolks. Add 3-3½ cups flour, until mixture is not sticky. Mix with yeast mixture.

After everything is mixed together, make a big ball of dough and put in fridge overnight in plastic bag.

Next day, preheat oven to 350. Cut dough in half. Roll out on a large floured board until it is thin.

Beat four egg whites – not quite as much as for meringue and spread half of egg whites over half of dough.

Filling: mix together 1 cup brown sugar, walnuts, raisins and cinnamon. This mixture goes on top of the half-dough that has egg whites on top. Roll up in tube pan, placing the half-dough mixture on the right side of the pan.

Repeat the same method for the other half of dough mixture, spreading remaining egg whites and filling. Roll up in tube pan, placing this half-dough mixture on the left. (They should meet in the centre.)

Boil a pot of water, reduce heat to a low boil and place a plate over pot. Place tube pan over plate. Put two light towels over unbaked bubka for about one hour.

Topping: Mix together ¼ cup soft butter and ¼ cup brown sugar with enough flour to make a crumbly mixture.

When the bubka has risen to about three-quarters of the pan, sprinkle the topping mix over the entire bubka. Put towels back on top until it rises to the top of pan. Bake for 55 minutes.

Note: The bubka can be made ahead and frozen.

CRUSTY TOPPED LOCKSHEN KUGEL

8 oz. cream cheese, softened
½ cup margarine, softened
1¼ cups sugar
8 eggs, well beaten
4½ cups milk
2 tsp. vanilla
1 tsp. lemon juice
dash salt
8 oz. egg noodles
½ cup graham cracker crumbs
1 tsp. cinnamon

Beat together cream cheese and margarine. Add sugar and mix well. Blend in eggs. Stir in next four ingredients. Cook noodles as directed and drain. Combine with cheese mixture. Pour into 9 x 13-in. baking dish. Mix graham cracker crumbs and cinnamon and sprinkle on top of noodles.

Bake at 350 for 1¼ hours or until browned and crusty on top. Allow to cool for 30 minutes. Cut in squares; can be topped with a dollop of sour cream and berries. Serves 10-12.

Winnipeg CJA campaign underway

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal kicked off its annual fundraising campaign at the beginning of September and as of last week had raised $525,000.

While the figure is at about the same as last year at this time, CJA executive director Jerry Koffman said that on a card-by-card basis, pledges are up 13 per cent overall. Superweek, Sept. 8 to 14, the annual phone blitz that marks the beginning of the campaign, raised close to $140,000.

"Our goal this year is $4.3 million," Koffman said. "We are emphasizing our community's needs, as well as the needs of Israel and our fellow Jews who are still living in the countries of the former Soviet Union. Almost everyone we were able to contact during Superweek made gifts."

The Federation/CJA campaign will not be the only major fundraising campaign in the community this year.

At the beginning of January, the Asper Jewish Community Campus, the community's six-year-old showplace, is launching a $7.5 million fundraising project to pay off its remaining $2-million debt, as well as improve its facilities – at an estimated cost of close to $3 million – and double the size of its $2.2 million endowment fund to address its long-term viability.

The Asper Campus campaign was timed to start Jan. 1 so as not to conflict with the CJA campaign, Asper JCC president Larry Hurtig said.

While the goal in building the campus was to have a debt-free building, Hurtig said initial fundraising fell short because the campus committee was unable to sell the old YMHA building downtown for its $2-million asking price and had to settle for $350,000.

Paying down its remaining debt will save the campus about $100,000 a year in interest charges, Hurtig said.

"As we also needed money for improvements and wanted to increase our endowment fund, we felt it was better to try to raise the funds all at the same time instead of having to go back to the community three times," he said.

The need for improvements to the campus' Rady Jewish Community Centre and to expand its Aleph Bet Day Care centre shows how popular the two are, Hurtig added.

The day care is filled to capacity with 48 children and has a waiting list of 110, he said, and the Rady Centre has almost double the number of members originally expected by planners.

The campus campaign hopes to raise $4 million from the Jewish community and the remainder from the general community, corporations, foundations and government grants, Hurtig said.

Smart estate planning saves $$

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

You may associate me with divorce work, but I also deal with estate planning issues, another aspect of our firm's expertise. Here I describe certain ways of legally avoiding tax in retirement years. Estate planning is important to families whether they are intact or falling apart. Here are some important tips to consider for the New Year, especially for people approaching retirement age in higher income brackets or with savings they have successfully accumulated. They have been compiled with the assistance of Michael Korman at Raymond James Financial Planning Ltd. (416) 777-7131. I caution that you speak to a qualified advisor before adopting any of these strategies.

Insured Annuities — A Useful Tip for People Approaching Retirement. Many investors approaching retirement age invest their non-registered funds in bonds, GICs, treasury bills, savings accounts and other low-risk investments. While these investments ensure safety of principal, their after-tax returns are generally quite low.

Preservation of capital and safety of principal are of paramount importance to retired or retiring investors, but usually go hand in hand with low returns. However, there is one often-overlooked alternative that can allow you to increase your after-tax return without eroding the capital available to your estate. This investment is called an insured annuity — a plan that combines high after-tax income with the security of capital preservation.

Insured annuity yields $2500 more than GICs with same invested capital

An insured annuity is actually a hybrid of two separate investments. The first is a prescribed annuity, an investment that can only be purchased with non-registered funds. A prescribed annuity not only provides lifetime income, but also receives favourable tax treatment, in that the interest component of each periodic payment is considered, for tax purposes, to be equal. The premiums for the second component of an insured annuity, the life insurance, are paid out of the income from the annuity. The life insurance portion is typically designed to pay a sum equivalent to your original annuity investment back to your beneficiaries tax-free. Thus, an insured annuity allows you to achieve higher after-tax returns with the benefit of tax-free capital paid to your heirs upon your death.

The reason that an insured annuity pays more after tax is that each annuity payment to you is made up of interest income plus a tax-free return of your original investment capital. The CCRA (formerly Revenue Canada) treats each annuity payment as a blend of non-taxable original capital and taxable interest income. Since only the interest portion of each annuity payment is taxable, the tax on your annuity income is much lower than on an equivalent payment made from a fixed-income investment such as a GIC. In fact, the tax savings are significant enough that even after paying for the life insurance premiums out of the annuity income, your net monthly income is still considerably higher than if you received the yield directly from a fixed-income instrument. In addition, upon your death, the proceeds of the life insurance policy pass directly to your beneficiaries free of probate fees.

The benefits of an insured annuity compared to a fixed-income investment are best illustrated by an example. In the following scenario, "Harry" relies on interest income from GICs to help fund his retirement, while Harry's twin brother "Bob" purchases an insured annuity. Both are 70 years of age.

Harry has $100,000 invested in a GIC yielding 5%, which provides him with $5,000 annually. He has other sources of income, so his marginal tax rate is 46%. Thus, after tax he receives $2,700 from his GICs, and doesn't touch the capital so that he can leave $100,000 to his children.

Bob, who is in the same tax bracket as Harry, wisely chooses to purchase an insured annuity. He buys a prescribed life annuity for $100,000, which will pay him $10,313 a year as long as he lives. Since only a portion of the annuity payment is taxable, the tax on the annuity income will be just $954 per year. With a portion of his annuity income, he buys a Term-To-100 life insurance policy that pays $100,000 to his heirs when he dies. This policy costs $4,138 per year, so after tax and the cost of the life insurance, he receives $5,221 a year. By purchasing an insured annuity, Bob receives $2,521 more than Harry receives from his GIC, with the same amount of invested capital. As an added bonus, Bob's beneficiaries will receive the proceeds of his life insurance directly, without probate fees.

The table below illustrates the dramatic increase in retirement income that an insured annuity offers over an investment in GICs.

The added benefit of allowing your heirs to receive the proceeds of your life insurance directly (without probate fees) makes an insured annuity even more attractive.

Needless to say, these are merely tips. Once again, a financial planner and tax lawyer or accountant should advise you before taking the plunge to tailor your personal circumstances, as there may well be excellent reasons not to invest in such vehicles, including the costs associated with them.

Winnipeg teen lauded at industry music festival

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Sophie Berkal-Sarbit may be on her way to international stardom.

The young Winnipeg singer, who recently celebrated her 13th birthday, was the winner in the best female Broadway vocalist category at the New York International Music Festival, a roving showcase for new talent that held its summer instalment in Las Vegas from July 22 to 29. It aims to help new singers and bands break into the music business.

Sophie competed against 200 other performers, almost all of them adults. Her mother, Harriet, notes that she received a standing ovation at the end of her performance.

Sophie comes by her musical ability naturally as the granddaughter of Rabbi Louis Berkal, the longtime chazzan at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, Winnipeg's largest shul. In fact, she and her zaide often perform in concerts together at the Sharon Home, a retirement residence.

The up-and-coming star studies voice with Catherine Robbins, the head of preparatory studies at the University of Manitoba's School of Music. In mid-August, she performed with noted local jazz musician and radio host Walle Larson at the Lyric Theatre in Winnipeg's Assiniboine Park.

For the young singer, the road to Las Vegas began last February when she was accepted to Camp Broadway, a short-term master class program taught by Broadway performers.

"The students in the camp are between 14 and 17," says her mother, Harriet. "They made an exception for Sophie."

Sophie Berkal-Sarbit

Looking around for another venue for Sophie, the family found the New York Festival on the Internet. They missed the first instalment at Madison Square Garden, but Sophie was able to qualify for Las Vegas.

To be eligible, she had to submit a demo CD with jazz and Broadway numbers. With Shayla Fink of the Winnipeg-based klezmer group Finjan accompanying her, Sophie made Drop Everything – Have a Listen, a compendium of seven Broadway songs.

In Las Vegas, each performer had to perform for two 15-minute periods. The young Winnipegger prepared five songs for each set.

The next stop for the festival winner is the Los Angeles leg of the festival, which runs until Sept. 28 and opened with a celebrity gala evening that let performers, artists and filmmakers show their work to distributors, record producers, talent agency personnel and international media representatives.

"Sophie is just doing this for fun and the experience, but you never know how these things turn out," her mother says. "If something comes of it, great. If not, this has been another opportunity to hone her performing skills."

In the meantime, to further improve her musical range, Sophie is going to study classical singing this year. There is also another leg of the festival in November in New York.

brainwashed to hate, and who encourages death and killing of innocent people – and on the other side who is really willing to compromise and give up some of his rights, who really tries to avoid killing innocent people and [instead] attack terrorists and arch terrorists, then Mr. Canada will have a stronger opinion about what Canadians' state of mind should be.

"And of course I expect the Canadian government to say very clearly to the Palestinians that they should go back to the table and make peace with Israel. I also expect the Canadian government – and not only the government but every prominent leader whether from the government or other fields like the arts – to say to the Palestinians very clearly and very loudly, 'Stop educating the next generation to admire killings and murders. Educate them to love peace.' "

The vast majority of Israelis are willing to compromise for "real peace," and they understand that they will help establish a Palestinian state, Brosh emphasized, but they will not agree to have "peace negotiations at night and suffer terror attacks during the day."

He is skeptical of reports that indicate increased Palestinian support for Yasser Arafat in the wake of a recent decision in principle by the Israeli Security Cabinet to "remove" the PA president.

"There are no spontaneous demonstrations in a dictatorship," he said.

Born in Haifa in 1962, Brosh is a sixth-generation Israeli on his father's side. His mother was born in Austria and sent to Liverpool, England, as part of the Kindertransport during World War II. She rejoined her parents in Israel in 1949.

A graduate of Hebrew University, Brosh said he would probably have pursued a PhD in Jewish history had he not embarked on a diplomatic career.

But as a diplomat, he said, "you're always a student. You learn about different cultures and political systems."

Sharon: Israel's threat made Arafat act against terror

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli threat to "remove" Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat appears to have compelled him to act against terror, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon says.

"It appears that the reprieve from terror attacks stems from the fact that Arafat was alarmed by the threat, and is acting to prevent terror attacks accordingly," Sharon said Sunday at the weekly Israeli cabinet meeting.

He was reacting to a minister's suggestion that Israel hold another discussion on whether to "remove" Arafat, and dismissed the United Nations General Assembly vote demanding that Israel drop the decision to get rid of Arafat.

The vote passed by 133 votes to 4, with 15 abstentions.

"We will not change our positions as a result of this or any other vote," Sharon told cabinet. "Israel will find ways to prevent disturbances on the part of the person who causes the country such major damage."

Sharon rejected a request by Interior Minister Avraham Poraz to revisit the Arafat decision. The cabinet made the decision after two suicide bombings two weeks ago, but was vague about the time and manner in which it would carry out any removal.

Poraz contended the decision had damaged Israel in the international realm and that many nations, in addition to the UN, had condemned the move.

Sharon replied: "There's no need to be alarmed by the criticism. There's no reason to debate the issue again."

Sharon also accused the opposition of making contact with the Palestinian Authority behind the government's back. He was referring to left-wing activist Uri Avneri, who suggested creating a human shield around Arafat. Sharon also condemned anti-government demonstrations, saying Israel was going through a difficult time and needs to be unified.

On Saturday, Israel condemned Friday's General Assembly vote as a miserable move that legitimizes a well-known terrorist.

"Israel regrets the fact that the Palestinians once again chose to turn their energies to the arena of rhetoric, as in this case of the UN General Assembly decision, instead of focusing on the essence, which is to fight terror together," the Foreign Ministry said in a statement.

The Palestinian Authority, however, expressed satisfaction at the outcome of the UN vote.

The United States and Israel voted against the motion, joined by the Marshall Islands and Micronesia. Australia, Cameroon, Canada, Kenya and Colombia were among those abstaining.

EU members unanimously supported the resolution after its sponsors agreed at the last minute to add phrases condemning both Palestinian suicide bombings and Israeli targeted killings of Palestinian extremists.

Under the EU amendments, the assembly voted to condemn "the suicide bombings and their recent intensification" but also to remind the Palestinian Authority that under the road map for Middle East peace – co-authored by the EU, United States, the UN and Russia – it is obligated to "take all necessary measures to end violence and terror."

The resolution also deplores Israel's "extrajudicial killings and their recent escalation" and says the killings are both violations of international law and an impediment to the peace process.

The United States had vetoed a similar, Arab-backed resolution in the UN Security Council last Tuesday. Eleven of the 15 member states voted in favour while Britain, Germany and Bulgaria abstained, but the United States exercised its veto on the grounds the resolution was "lopsided" for not condemning terrorist groups behind suicide attacks against Israeli civilians.

Turning to the General Assembly after a U.S. veto in the Security Council is a traditional tactic for the Arab bloc, which has strong support there. But while council votes can be binding under international law, assembly measures merely reflect the will of the international community.

New Mideast initiative seeks to bypass traditional leaders

By MAZAL MUALEM
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — A week after the 10th anniversary of the Oslo accords, a gathering was set to take place Monday at the Rockefeller Mansion, about an hour north of New York City, that was to include an Israeli and Palestinian team for five days of talks.

At the completion of the meetings, a 10-point document will be made public with recommendations on ways to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The document will then be made available to hundreds of thousands of Palestinians and Israelis, who will participate in a referendum organized by IBM that will ask them to respond to each of the points.

The purpose of the project is to bypass politicians and transfer the decision-making about a solution to the conflict directly to the people, who are then expected to pressure their leaders.

In Israel, an interesting pair of Israeli politicians will follow the discussions closely: deputy minister of industry and trade, Michael Ratzon, a right-wing member of the Likud, and MK Matan Vilnai, a right-winger in Labor.

The two are partners in the initiative, and despite their ideological differences, their common security-minded approach to a solution has led to their collaboration.

A no less interesting partnership in the project involves the brother of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, Fathi Arafat, a Gaza-based pediatrician, and the son of the former Palestinian prime minister Mahmoud Abbas, Yasser Abbas, a businessman.

Backing the initiative is Jewish businessman Daniel Levtzky, who set up a group called People's Voice, which is organizing the project.

Among the members of the advisory committee are World Zionist Congress President Edgar Bronfman, James Zogby, president of the Arab-American Institute, and Hollywood stars Danny De Vito, Brad Pitt, Jennifer Aniston and Jason Alexander.

Similar in spirit to the effort of Ami Ayalon and Sari Nusseibeh set up last June, the project reflects the disappointment and fatigue the public feels about the abilities of the leaders on both sides to end the conflict.

However, unlike the Ayalon-Nusseibeh partnership, the public will not be presented with a solution. Another major difference is that the latest initiative is a partnership of ideological rivals.

Hostage exchange deal with Hezbollah days away: report

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A hostage deal between Israel and Hezbollah will be completed within a few days, Israeli security sources were quoted as saying Monday by Palestinian newspaper Al-Quds, published in east Jerusalem.

According to the report, the head of the Israeli team negotiating the hostages' release left for Berlin on Sunday and met with a German mediator to complete the final details of the agreement.

Sources in Lebanon and Israel told the paper that the final list of prisoners to be released by Israel as part of the deal is taking form.

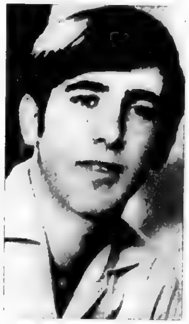
According to the report, Israel will release Abdel Karim Obeid and Mustafa Dirani, two Lebanese guerrilla leaders it snatched in the late 1980s and early 1990s to win the release of kidnapped Israeli Air Force navigator Ron Arad, who was shot down over Lebanon in 1986, as well as other Palestinian, Lebanese and Syrian prisoners.

In return, Hezbollah would release Israeli businessman Elchanan Tannenbaum and the three Israeli soldiers, Benny Avraham, Omar Suwad and Adi Avitan, that the army has declared war casualties whose place of burial is unknown.

Hezbollah seized the three soldiers along Israel's northern border in October 2000, months after Israel ended its 22-year occupation of south Lebanon.

Weeks later, it seized Israeli reserve officer Tannenbaum, saying he was a Mossad agent. Israel has declared the three captured soldiers dead, but the return of their bodies is considered a priority. Tannenbaum is still alive.

A Palestinian source close to the German mediator told Associated Press on Monday that Israel has agreed in principle to release about 400 Arab prisoners, including at least 200 Palestinians.



Ron Arad

Marwan Barghouti, the most senior Palestinian held by Israel, tops the list of those Hezbollah seeks to free, the source said, adding that talks on who will be released are ongoing.

Meanwhile, Israel's Chief Rabbi Yona Metzger was set to leave Monday for Kazakhstan to discuss the release of Arad with Iranian delegates.

He told police officers during a Rosh Hashanah toast at police headquarters that after a meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, he would be leaving for the Muslim state to meet with an Iranian delegate, an ayatollah named Humeini who is a senior representative of Saudi Arabia's king, as well as with Christian representatives.

The goal is to make headway on the release of the Israeli hostages, especially Arad. When asked who would accompany him on the trip, Rabbi Metzger replied: "The Holy One Blessed be He."

Lebanon's Hezbollah guerrilla group promised German mediators negotiating the possible prisoner swap with Israel that it would look into Arad's fate, it said in remarks published on Monday.

Hezbollah has long sought to swap four Israelis in its custody for Lebanese and other Arab prisoners in Israeli jails, including Palestinians. Hezbollah said the talks were favourable and hopes the prisoners would be home soon.

"We really care about finding out the fate of Arad, and we have many motives and reasons that push us to continue looking into it," Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah told Lebanon's as-Safir daily.

"We reiterated to the German mediator: We don't have any new information, but we promise you… that Hezbollah will exert utmost efforts to obtain evidence of Arad's fate."

Previous swap talks in 2001 stalled partly over Arad and the fate of four Iranian diplomats who Tehran says are in Israel after they were reportedly kidnapped by Christian Lebanese militiamen after Israel's 1982 war in Lebanon.

Nasrallah said Hezbollah wanted to ensure the release of Palestinian prisoners not included in the deal being discussed and "to resolve the fate of the Iranian diplomats that Israel says it does not have, but who we consider to be alive and in Israeli custody."

Israel said last month it hoped to secure a swap within months, and Nasrallah also said he hoped an exchange was near.

Past and future in focus as S. Africa Jewish group marks 100 years

By MOIRA SCHNEIDER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — South Africa's main Jewish group is celebrating its 100th anniversary, and concerns about the community's future – and its past – are dominating the organization's efforts.

One of the issues causing the concern is the widely held conviction among South African Jews that their government is pro-Palestinian – particularly rankling to a community that has always been strongly pro-Zionist – and that the Jewish community is being sidelined.

The Jewish community's perceived lack of support for the anti-apartheid cause is also under scrutiny.

These issues came to the fore at the South African Jewish Board of Deputies' recent conference, held in honour of the group's centenary.

Russell Gaddin, the board's newly elected president, discussed his concern that the community is being pushed into a "smaller and smaller" role in national politics.

To secure a meeting with South African President Thabo Mbeki took the board "many, many months of urging. I feel that as representatives of South African Jewry, we should have been granted a meeting on request," he said.

"Perhaps we were a little bit spoiled by former President [Nelson] Mandela, who was defended by Jews" – in his trials by the apartheid government – "and had Jewish doctors and advisers," Gaddin said.

The Jewish community's small size – 75,000 – as compared with the roughly 1 million Muslims in South Africa, may account for some of the perceived neglect. But ties between the ruling African National Congress and anti-Israel groups also could be to blame, some say.

"Why, when there are so many pressing issues in South Africa such as crime and the Zimbabwe situation, does Israel continually come up for debate in Parliament?" Gaddin asked, voicing the community's feelings of insecurity on the matter.

Fuelling the concerns, the Jewish leader of the opposition Democratic Alliance, Tony Leon, talked about the meeting earlier this year between the country's deputy foreign minister, Aziz Pahad, and the anti-Israel Lebanese militia group Hezbollah.

After the May meeting, Pahad commended Hezbollah and pledged to continue contact between it and the South African government, Leon said.

But in his keynote address at the opening of the conference, Mbeki reassured the community that the government wouldn't tolerate anti-Semitism.

He paid tribute to the "many patriots from the Jewish community who played a role to free our country from racist tyranny" and added that Jews were among those prominent in rebuilding the country.

Mbeki addressed another issue: the viability of the community and its institutions after large-scale emigration that has seen its numbers drop from 118,000 in the mid-1970s.

Since South Africa's transition to democracy, emigration has been fuelled by rising violent crime as well as by affirmative action. Many young people leave after finishing university for job opportunities abroad.

A resolution passed at the conference addressed the issue, calling on the board to "pay urgent attention to finding ways of reducing emigration."

Mbeki expressed his concern at a survey conducted by the London-based Institute for Jewish Policy Research in conjunction with the University of Cape Town's Kaplan Centre for Jewish Studies and Research, which found that 60 per cent of the community did not see a long-term future for Jews in South Africa and referred to their "pervading sense of unease" toward an increase in anti-Semitism.

"Let me say clearly and unequivocally," Mbeki said, "that our government would be pleased to spend as much time as may be required to address the concerns of our Jewish community with its representatives."

Mbeki said the government supported the road map Mideast peace plan and would "continue to do everything in its power to facilitate this outcome with both the Israeli government and the Palestinians."

Commenting after the speech, the board's past president Mervyn Smith said there is no doubt there were "major issues concerning the lack of easy access to the South African government, which the Jewish community no longer enjoys," but he said Mbeki's speech was "remarkable for an open invitation he issued to the community to come and talk about issues that concerned it."

In honour of the centenary, the World Jewish Congress held its first-ever meeting in South Africa after the board's meeting.

The board also engaged in some soul-searching by highlighting an issue that attracted more criticism to it in the past than any other – its failure to speak out against the apartheid system.

Addressing the conference, Smith said the community's leaders had displayed a lack of moral leadership and that in his view, the Jewish community of South Africa had failed "the struggle" – as the fight against apartheid is sometimes called here.

In addition, the failure to speak out had its effects in present-day South Africa, he said. "Because we were not connected to the struggle, we failed to develop meaningful contact with future black leadership which would have stood us in good stead today."

While the South African media is also perceived by the community to be anti-Israel, leading Jewish journalist Jeremy Gordin warned against "shooting the messenger," saying that Israel was not always right.

But the board's media team gave examples of slanted reporting and steps that have been taken to combat Islamic fundamentalist views.

Obituary

A great loss to the Jewish people

By KENNETH GREEN

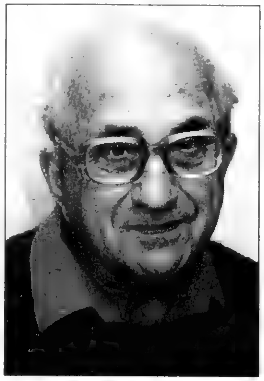
Special to The CJN

We are deeply saddened by the death of Prof. Emil L. Fackenheim in Jerusalem, last Friday, Sept. 19, at the age of 87. It is a great personal loss to all of us who knew him, revered him and loved him.

Fackenheim's death is also a great loss to the Jewish people. He was internationally acknowledged as one of the most important Jewish philosophers of the 20th century. But not only was he a great Jewish thinker, he was also a great Jew. He insisted on reminding us of what our primary duty as Jews is: ahavat Israel, love of Israel. Indeed, in his life, as in his thought, he was a true lover of Israel, the Jewish state and the Jewish people, both religious and secular.

In this I shall not recount the facts of his life, but will leave that to others. What I would most like to call to mind is what he gave to the Jewish people. He came to take a generation lost and wandering in the aftermath of the Holocaust, and he pointed them in the direction in which they should go.

The most famous statement he ever made was in a powerful little book he wrote, with the provocative title, God's Presence in History (1970). When most Jews, never mind the rest of the world, still wanted to turn their eyes away from the terrible events of the Holocaust, he insisted that we must think about it and respond to it as the challenge of our time. He stated that the Holocaust ushered in a moral commandment to all Jews, which he called "the 614th commandment" – Jews must not give a posthumous victory to Hitler.



Emil Fackenheim

What did he mean by this? It is a moral imperative for Jews to continue to fight against the most essential thing Adolf Hitler stood for, which is the complete eradication of the Jewish people. Jews must act to preserve Judaism and to continue as Jews, if for no other reason than to make sure the Nazis did not succeed.

He saw Jews doing this almost by instinct, the most powerful evidence being not only the strength of the immediate survivors to go on, but especially the existence of the Jewish state. Israel is the Jewish people's healthy and moral answer to all those who hate them and who still try to destroy them.

Further, he argued that the Holocaust is a world-historical event, not just for the Jews, but also for the West, and indeed for all humanity. What the Jews do is most significant; but the Holocaust must also be wrestled with in the realm of thought, even if no "meaning" can be extracted from it. We are only called on to respond to it, but our response must be authentic. He later developed these ideas in what must be called the magnum opus of his Jewish thought, To Mend the World: Foundations of Post-Holocaust Thought (1982).

Through most of his life, Fackenheim went against the tide: he stood up courageously and he spoke out repeatedly on this issue, although he was much criticized for it in later years. His critics charged that he made the Holocaust too central to Judaism. He retorted that it could not be made central enough, because the real problem of our time is that most people wish that the Holocaust would go away, that we move on from it and that we treat it like every other tragedy that has befallen the Jewish people. He said this is both morally irresponsible and theologically impossible, as well as intellectually dishonest.

I would be remiss if I failed to mention something about Fackenheim the philosopher. If he had never written anything on Judaism, he would still have to be remembered as a major force in contemporary philosophy. He wrote a penetrating book on the 19th-century German philosopher Hegel, suggesting that, though his philosophy is in need of some correction, it is still one of the most helpful guides to understanding the effects of history on man and the world.

Fackenheim also wrote powerful works on theology in general, interpreting the contemporary meaning of divine revelation, especially as expressed in the Hebrew Bible. As a theologian, Fackenheim attempted to resolve our perplexities about God's relation to Israel, which he saw as a continuing reality (however strained, if not ruptured, by the Holocaust), by the mere fact of Jewish survival. It is through noble dedication to continued Jewish existence, on both the personal and the national level, and in both the religious and the secular domains, that the mending of this rupture may occur in future.

If the Holocaust ushered in a moral imperative for the Jews to survive (which he believed was equally binding on both religious and secular Jews), the State of Israel is the proof that this imperative is being heeded. The continuing fight of Israel for survival is the main fulfilment of that moral imperative. And this is genuinely moral, in Fackenheim's view, because it not only benefits the Jews, but is a good for all of humanity.

For Jews, it is best to help Israel survive, and hence for humanity to retain its moral core, by living in Israel, heroically participating in the creation of a third Jewish commonwealth against tremendous odds.

But he added a surprising addendum for those Jews who, for one reason or another, could not settle in Israel: have just one more Jewish child than you were originally planning to have.

What made Fackenheim unique and what impressed all those who knew and learned from him, was how he combined profundity of thought with personal integrity. He exemplified the integrity of both philosophy (in short supply in the 20th century) and of Judaism by being a man who practised what he preached. He told us that the State of Israel is in the forefront of contemporary Jewish history, and so he acted on his principle: he got up and with his family moved to Israel in 1984, settling in Jerusalem, and living there the rest of his life—never backsliding, however great the personal difficulties that followed on his decision.

Fackenheim was a spiritual giant and a radical thinker. On a personal level, I must say that I pursued Jewish philosophy because of what he stood for and because of what he taught me about both Judaism and philosophy. But what he did for me is no exception. It is typical of what he did for numerous students who came into contact with him or his books: he educated an entire generation. He instructed us with his powerful ideas, he inspired us with the example of his life and he exhorted us to be better Jews.

I feel privileged to have known him, to have been his student and his friend. But the debt I owe him is hardly what matters; what matters is the debt which the Jewish people owes him for the moral clarity of his vision. May his memory be for a blessing.

Kenneth Green was a student of Emil Fackenheim. He teaches at the University of Toronto.

Editor's note:

Emil Fackenheim, the author of dozens of books on Judaism and the Holocaust, was born in Halle, Germany, in 1916, and graduated from the Academy for the Scientific Investigation of Judaism in Berlin. In 1938, he was ordained as a Reform rabbi at the Liberal Rabbinical Seminar in Berlin.

The same year, after the Nov. 9 terror of Kristallnacht, he was briefly interned at the Sachsenhausen concentration camp just outside Berlin, but managed to immigrate to Canada in 1940, where he became a rabbi, then a professor of philosophy (1948-84) at University of Toronto.

In 1984, he immigrated to Israel, where he was associated for many years with the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Fackenheim was also a former columnist of The CJN.

Hamas pleads for help from Arab world

By ARNON REGULAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Last week, two days after the failed attempt by Israel on the life of Hamas spiritual leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, Hamas sent an official plea to the Arab world for help.

The request was disseminated on the group's Internet site, by telephone and other forms of communication throughout the Arab world at one of the most critical points in Hamas' history.

One of the reasons for the plea was the stepped-up attempts by Israel to kill the group's military and political leadership, as well as its middle-ranking and grassroots activists. The number of targeted killings this month stands at 14.

Other reasons are the freezing of bank accounts belonging to charitable organizations affiliated with the group in the territories, the increased supervision of contributions to Hamas in the Gulf states, and the European Union's decision to place the political leadership on its list of terror organizations.

The Hamas request included a plea to the Arab countries to condemn the targeted killings and to exert diplomatic pressure to change the EU's decision, as well as pleas for support from the man on the street and for clergy to issue fatwas in favour of Hamas.

A series of internal flyers distributed to a select few in Gaza and obtained by Ha'aretz reveal that the March killings of Ibrahim Makadma and others were a warning that the killings were beginning on a large scale.

Makadma was involved directly in military operations and therefore some of the leadership mistakenly thought the killings were aimed merely at the Iza Din al-Kassam military brigades, which had been hit many times during the intifadah by Israel.

The doubts held by some of these leaders – ironically also by the relatively moderate Ismail Abu Shanab, who was hit in a targeted killing last month – ended when Israel also attacked senior Hamas leader Abdel Aziz Rantisi in June, a few weeks before the ceasefire between Palestinian extremist groups, indicating the move was aimed at the leadership as well as the rank-and-file.

It is too soon to speculate whether the round of targeted killings has ended, but it's clear it has already had a profound effect on Hamas. Low-level activists, such as those who distribute flyers or organize demonstrations, and activists at the Islamic University in Gaza, have gone underground.

Hamas' military wing was always shrouded in secrecy, but over the past few weeks, its public military parades in Gaza have almost completely disappeared. Those who expected a furious outburst at the attempt on Yassin, in the form of an armed demonstration by the military wing – a mere triviality during the intifadah – found instead a parade of women and children.

The heads of the military and political wings are on the run and do not sleep at home, and in practice, there has been barely any public activity since the wave of targeted killings began.

Until recently, European diplomats would meet with Hamas political leaders in Gaza to get updates and try to understand the group's position. This gave the Hamas leadership legitimacy and recognition as well as diplomatic channels of communication.

But the EU's recent decision suddenly cut off these contacts and left Hamas worried about its ability to raise funds in Europe, where there is a large Muslim population.

It has also had an effect in the Arab world. The first harbinger came from Jordan, whose government announced it was freezing accounts held by Hamas members in Jordanian banks.

In order to cut their losses, Hamas leaders reacted by trying to strengthen ties with Egypt, which over the past year has taken the place of Syria and the Gulf states as Hamas' diplomatic address. This has made the group increasingly dependent on Cairo over the past months and its leaders are constantly visiting the Egyptian capital.

The Week in Israel

Sept. 15

- Four Israelis were among eight people being held hostage in Colombia. The eight were kidnapped while hiking near ruins in the northern mountains by leftist anti-government guerrillas.

Sept. 16

- Israel is reducing its allocation to the Birthright Israel program. The cut in the state's 2004 draft budget would reduce the sum to $500,000 (US) over 5 years from its original $14-million commitment. Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu pledged to restore Israel's financial commitment to Birthright in 2005.

Sept. 17

- Israel reportedly has agreed to release some top Hezbollah prisoners in exchange for businessman Elchanan Tannenbaum and the remains of three Israeli soldiers kidnapped in Har Dov in 2000.

Sept. 18

- Israeli media reported that Egyptian intellectuals are warning against suing Jews for gold the ancient Hebrews took from Egypt. Abd al-Wahab al-Masiri, who has written about Jews and Judaism, said a lawsuit could bolster Zionist claims to the Land of Israel.

Sept. 19

- Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said Palestinian Authority prime minister-designate Ahmed Qureia can prove himself as a peace partner only by launching a crackdown on extremist groups once he takes office. "As long as [Yasser] Arafat continues to be the Palestinian leader, I don't think there's a chance to move forward in the peace process," Mofaz told Israel Radio. He made the remarks after U.S. President George W. Bush said the day before that the road map peace plan had stalled because of Arafat's failed leadership.

Greetings from CJC

denunciation of Ahenakew's remarks by First Nations leaders and grassroots members, along with the renewal of ties between our two communities, will be the enduring legacy of that story.

This past year, CJC was particularly active on the parliamentary scene, appearing before House of Commons and Senate committees and presenting briefs on several proposed legislative changes to the Criminal Code and other laws that affect our community's interests. As usual, we were also busy with the Department of Foreign Affairs, presenting briefs in advance of the UN Commission of Human Rights meetings in Geneva. CJC also answered Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham's call for input on Canada's foreign policy, submitting a comprehensive document on international anti-Semitism, terrorism, Jews from Arab lands and support for Israel.

Officials from the Foreign Affairs and Canadian Heritage departments looked to CJC for its expertise as they prepared for Canada's participation in a June conference on anti-Semitism convened by the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Vienna (OSCE). CJC met with members of the Canadian delegation prior to the conference. Staff from CJC's offices in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto are currently preparing for the visit to Canada by the UN Special Rapporteur on Contemporary Forms of Racism. Roundtable sessions on antiSemitism were to have been held between Sept. 16 and Sept. 25 in each of the three cities.

CJC is also challenging an application to broadcast the Al Jazeera network in Canada. The comprehensive 36-page legal brief we submitted to the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) includes numerous examples of the network's virulent anti-Semitism and cites jurisprudence pertaining to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms that answers all who would mischaracterize our opposition as quelling free speech.

These briefs and others can be found on the CJC Web site at www.cjc.ca.

I have touched on only a few of the year's highlights, and much has been left out (such as CJC missions to Israel, including the Ontario mayors' mission). The past year has been one of the most challenging, hectic, demanding and ultimately, rewarding in my 20-some years as a volunteer in this community. I am proud of the accomplishments of this outstanding organization, which has been called by The CJN the "rampart for the Jews of Canada since its founding in 1919." It is a role CJC is well-prepared to continue long into the future as we face the challenges ahead.

I wish you all a sweet year and a meaningful fast.

German Jews shaken by bomb plot

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BERLIN — A feeling of insecurity has spread through Germany's Jewish community since authorities uncovered a plot to plant a bomb at a November ceremony to launch the construction of a new synagogue in Munich, Jewish leaders said last week.

Authorities last week announced the arrest of an 11th suspect in the foiled neo-Nazi plot to plant a bomb at the Nov. 9 ceremony, which coincides with the anniversary of the Nazis' 1938 Kristallnacht pogrom in which thousands of shuls and Jewish businesses were attacked.

The deputy leader of the Central Council of German Jews, Charlotte Knobloch, said the country's right wing has not been so organized since the Nazi era.

> 'Neo-Nazi attack is an assault against humanity'

"We're asking ourselves: Has it gone so far again?" said Knobloch.

Another German Jewish leader, Paul Spiegel, said most Germans viewed the foiled plot as an attack against Jews that did not concern them.

"They don't grasp that this neo-Nazi attack is an assault against humanity and against democracy in this country," Spiegel told Phoenix television.

The author Ralph Giordano, a Holocaust survivor who remained in Germany after the war, called on all Germans to become more vigilant against the right wing.

"Munich is the final warning," said Giordano, 80, who was in Berlin to accept a prize from the Leo Baeck Institute for promoting German-Jewish reconciliation through his works, which include the autobiographical novel The Bertinis, which tells the story of a Jewish family in Hamburg during World War II.

Eleven people, including a well-known neo-Nazi, Martin Wiese, have been arrested in the past two weeks in connection with the alleged plot to plant a bomb at the ceremony marking the laying of a cornerstone at the new synagogue in central Munich.

The main Munich synagogue destroyed by the Nazis was never rebuilt. Instead, the Jewish community established three smaller synagogues.

The latest suspect, a 17-year-old, was arrested in Munich and was being held on suspicion of belonging to a terrorist organization, said a spokesperson for federal prosecutors in Karlsruhe. No other details were released.

The Sueddeutsche Zeitung reported last week that Wiese had purchased 1.7 kilograms of TNT that police seized in a raid last week.

A security official in the eastern state of Brandenburg, state Interior Minister Joerg Schoenbohm, called for more undercover operations against the far-right.

SHRUGGING OUR SHOULDERS WHEN OUR PEOPLE ARE BEING SLAUGHTERED AND ASKING "WHAT CAN WE DO?" IS NO LONGER AN OPTION

THE WAR FOR ISRAEL'S SURVIVAL

Yesha Rapid Response Teams - The Frontline Defenders of Israel

Throughout YESHA (Judea, Samaria and Aza) an ever intensifying war continues. An ever greater part of this war has moved into the heart of the communities of Yesha. The burden of this war is borne by the Rapid Response Teams of these communities.

The "Iron Triangle" and "Backbone of the Mountain" are names used by the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) to describe the four settlements that surround the holy biblical city of Schechem (Nablus), a major base of Hamas and Jihad Islami terrorists. The community of Yitzhar is one of the four settlements (Elon Moreh, Bracha and Itamar are the others,) situated in this region. It was infiltrated on a moonless Thursday night by two heavily armed terrorists who were detected below one of Yitzhar's outposts. An alarm was sounded and the Rapid Response Team (RRT) sprung into action. Within five minutes one terrorist was killed and the second who was wounded escaped to a nearby Arab village.

Who and what are these response teams and how do they function?

During the early 1970's the Arabs, as part of their relentless war on Israel, began a campaign specifically targeting civilians to murder or kidnap. To limit the damage of these attacks, the IDF turned to Yesha and the border communities and asked them to organize Rapid Response Teams (RRTs or Kitot Konnenut) tasking them with containing these attacks until the army's arrival. With time, the Arabs changed their strategy and tactics and these units were effectively abandoned.

In the early '80's a new military command named Hagmar (regional defense command) was created in Yesha by Chief of Staff (C.O.S.) Raphael Eitan, utilising the potential of the soldiers living in the settlements to serve under a local command. Having been initially well trained and equipped, these highly motivated units excelled as a deterrent force. This drew the attention and wrath of the ever-vociferous extreme left, demanding the dissolution and disarmament of these units, claiming the Jews of Yesha were becoming a militia unto themselves.

These baseless claims found a receptive ear among the new Chiefs of Staff - Shomron, Shahak and Barak - in the years to come. They stripped these units of training, equipment and any meaningful assignments, ultimately leaving them without a sense of mission. The final blow was struck after the Rabin assassination when the armouries and individuals living in the settlements were stripped of their weapons and ammunition, effectively leaving certain areas and Jews in Yesha defenceless.

As the Oslo agreement deteriorated and unpublished intelligence reports indicated the formation by the P.A. of special liquidation units (based on the Holocaust era S.S. Einzatsgruppen) trained for the sole purpose of annihilating the Jews in the communities of Yesha. Much feverish activity took place, once again leading to no real concrete changes.

A reassessment by the IDF of the purpose of the Rapid Response Teams finally took shape in the late '90s under the guidance of then C.O.S. Shaul Mofaz and his assistant, the current C.O.S. Moshe Yaalon. At the time, they anticipated large scale attacks directed at outlying settlements and realized that the Arab forces spread throughout the villages in Yesha had the firepower, training and ability to cut off all the roads to the settlements. Therefore it was established that from here on, these RRTs would be responsible to repel an attack - without relying on the IDF. Although responsibility was now transferred to these units, little was done in terms of training or equipment.

Since September 2000, the face of Israel completely changed, confronting the average citizen with unprecedented violence and terror. The Arabs concentrated most of their firepower on the roads leading to the Yesha communities, knowing full well that these roads are their lifelines and simply put, not being able to travel means not being able to exist. These Yesha communities have borne the brunt of this savage and relentless guerrilla war in which the overwhelming strategic advantage clearly goes to the attacking forces, as they select the time and location of their assault, forcing Yesha communities to be on constant alert, never knowing where and when to expect the next terror attack.

By March 2002 the situation deteriorated further, with a series of well planned attacks that have developed into the main thrust and strategy of the Arabs in their quest to destroy the settlements. Arabs have been - and still are - employed in the communities and in many places are part of the daily lives of its inhabitants. Their almost unnoticed presence enables them to pass on "real time" intelligence in order to exploit weaknesses, to strike at will. This incredible phenomenon continues in most of the communities in Yesha to this very day.

In March 2002, within a period of two weeks, four communities were infiltrated in the Gush Katif area alone, resulting in the murder of 11 people, 7 of them teenagers. Whole families were obliterated as the Arabs sought to sow as much carnage as possible within the shortest possible time. Between March 2002 and February 2003 more than 500 infiltrations were attempted against Yesha communities. It was quickly realized that their security network must be immediately reorganized in order to survive. After discussions between the settlements and the I.D.F. a decision was made to delegate the tasks of security to the Rapid Response Teams. These teams were composed of twelve of the most capable combat experienced men living in the yishuv. The teams, however, were neither equipped, trained nor available to counter the new threat.

To equip a twelve man Rapid Response Team costs approximately $60,000 (U.S.) not including the intensive continuous training required. At present, very few communities have the resources to adequately train and equip Rapid Response Teams. The existing teams are fulfilling their responsibilities dangerously under-equipped. The I.D.F. - except for some assault rifles and ammunition - does not provide any additional equipment due to their own dire budgetary constraints.

In January 1999, as a result of the ever increasing violence, and foreseeing a sustained guerrilla war, a grassroots organization was formed by community activists living in the outlying settlements, who named their organization "Mishmeret Yesha" (Guardians of Yesha). Amongst its goals was the strengthening of the security of all outposts and settlements. Since September 2000, Mishmeret Yesha undertook to provide armored vests and other critical non-lethal equipment (communications gear, scopes, ballistic helmets, night vision binoculars, tactical lighting, etc.), which are desperately needed to strengthen these units operating on the frontlines of Yesha.

The past 31 months of endless attacks - and countless alerts and alarms - have exhausted the energies of the men and women in the outlying Yesha communities. Having lived with the violence on the roads for many years, the Jews of Yesha expected that at least inside their settlement and homes, they were safe. Now however, the violence has been thrust into Yesha's schools, homes and bedrooms.

Mishmeret Yesha is requesting Jewish communities worldwide to stand by their brave Jewish brethren in Yesha and enable them to hold the front lines of Israel at this most perilous juncture in Israel's existence - and help them to stop the next tragedy before it happens (G-d forbid). The monies required by Mishmeret Yesha for this project are not for victims, not for ambulances, not for medical equipment, nor for trees. These monies are for preventing the next attack. This is one project in which all Jews can and must participate to actually change the situation.

By doing so, one really observes two commandments of the Torah; "DO NOT STAND IDLY BY YOUR BROTHER'S BLOOD" and "LOVE YOUR NEIGHBOUR AS YOU LOVE YOURSELF".

FILMMAKER SHOPSOWITZ SEEKS HOME MOVIES, LETTERS, DIARIES FOR WORLD WAR II DOCUMENTARY

Veteran Toronto filmmaker Karen Shopsowitz and the production company YAP Films recently started pre-production for a three-hour, three-part documentary series for television about the lives of ordinary Canadians during the Second World War.

Titled Canada's War: The Lost Colour Archives, the series is being timed to coincide with the 60th anniversary of D-Day in June 2004. Shopsowitz and her associates are seeking colour footage, shot either in Canada or by servicemen overseas, which may have lain neglected in homes or archives for decades.

"We're looking for those films sitting in people's basements and attics, forgotten reels of 16-mm or 8-mm colour film, shot during the '30s and '40s," she said. "There's a lot more footage out there than people would expect… What we're doing is asking people to take a look and see what's there."

Historian Jack Granatstein, a consultant for the series, speaks enthusiastically about its potential to present a completely unknown side of World War II. "Home movies can show what people wore and how they lived, while servicemen's films can add a wholly new aspect to our understanding of the soldiers' lives overseas," he said.

The team is also hoping to unearth letters, diaries and other materials. According to executive producer Elliott Halpern, the finished product "will enable a new generation to understand the sacrifice of a nation and experience for themselves what drove it to victory."

Do you have material to contribute? If so, contact Shopsowitz at 416-504-6662 or by e-mail at kshopsowitz@yapfilms.com.

Kfir Gluzberg's pictures of architectural Israel are on view at the Klim Gallery until Oct. 9

Photos from Israel: Kfir Gluzberg, an 18-year-old former CHAT student now in his second year of architectural studies at the University of Waterloo, took hundreds of photos of doors and windows during a Birthright trip to Israel in May. His parents Daniel and Raya Gluzberg, who run the Klim Art Gallery, have assembled about 60 of his best pieces into a photographic exhibition, "The Gates of Jerusalem."

The show opened in the midtown space last week and remains on view until Oct. 9.

Originally from Vilnius, Lithuania, the Gluzbergs lived in Israel for 16 years and moved to Canada when Kfir was four years old. They are the exclusive representatives in Canada for Rolling Stone musician and painter Ron Wood. They also run an art school and are active in art publishing and promotion.

Klim is located at 2473 Yonge St. (near Castlefield). 416-932-9221.

Art Deco at the ROM: Fresh from London's Victoria and Albert Museum, Art Deco 1910-1939 – the wonderful and wide-ranging display of prewar art deco objects that opened last week at the Royal Ontario Museum – naturally includes ample representation by Jewish artists.

A pair of matching porcelain figurines titled Prince and Princess, for example, are the work of German artist Gerhard Shliepstein, about 1925, and were a gift from Mrs. Saul. A. Silverman of Montreal; the ROM has ranked them among the top 10 items in the exhibition. Visitors will also enjoy the exquisite bookbindings by artists Rose Adler and Madeline Kohn.

However, the modernesque poster produced by artist Jupp Wiertz about 1935 for display in travel agencies may evoke mixed feelings. It bids travellers to have a "Pleasant Trip to Germany" and features numerous modern modes of travel, including a Hindenburg-style zeppelin with Nazi swastikas on the tail fins. History has added an unintended but unavoidable layer of irony.

The exhibition, which continues until Jan. 4, 2004, is enhanced by art deco objects from the ROM's Bernard and Syvia Ostry Collection. Housed in the Samuel European Galleries, the Ostry collection features 50 rare and exemplary works including furniture, lamps and decorative sculptures.

Nobody Swings on Sunday an elegy to Toronto's Jewish past

By TAMMY STONE
Special to The CJN

"We children of immigrants live in two worlds: the one we were born to in Canada, and the one our parents escaped from." So begins Nobody Swings on Sunday, a new documentary by Harry Rasky that explores the Toronto Jewish experience in the 1930s and 1940s.

During a career that has spanned five decades and more than 40 documentaries, Rasky has mined diverse subject matter in distinguished works about some of the great artists of modern times – from singer/songwriter Leonard Cohen to playwright Tennessee Williams and photographer Yousuf Karsh.

He has also been nominated for a number of Emmy and Academy awards, notably for his 1977 masterpiece Homage to Chagall: The Colours of Love.

"But I always wanted to do something about my own roots," he says from his Toronto home.

The opportunity presented itself two years ago when he gave a guided tour of the St. Clair West area where he grew up, starting at the Earlscourt branch of the Toronto Public Library just south of Dufferin Street and St. Clair Avenue.

Rasky says he "reluctantly agreed to do it," and couldn't have anticipated the turnout – about 200 people – nor the interest participants took in the tour.

Luckily, he brought a cameraman with him to record the event, and the footage became the seed of this portrait of Rasky's – and Toronto's – past.

Based largely on his book of the same name, the title of the film, which airs on CBC-TV Sept. 25 at 7 p.m., refers to an almost comical edict passed by the authorities in Toronto during the Depression.

At the time, Toronto was predominantly Protestant, and Rasky recalls that a police officer once stopped him from playing in the park with the words: "Oh laddie. Oh no. On the Lord's Day, nobody swings on Sunday." (Needless to say, the fact Rasky was Jewish and that Saturday was his Sabbath would not have made a difference to the officer.)

With deft humour and a talent for engaging storytelling, Rasky narrates the documentary, combining personal details about his family's experiences with facts about Jewish life in Toronto.

Jews were the single largest minority group in the city during the 1930s and 1940s, and most lived in and around Kensington Market.

Rasky's family, Russian immigrants, lived in the St. Clair West area, another partially Jewish enclave further north.

"My memory of that time was of having a rough time," Rasky says, because his parents spoke a different language and anti-Semitism was prevalent.

"I wanted to express all those things [in the film]."

Rasky weaves many elements into the nostalgic film, including his own evocative paintings and those of Aba Bayefsky that depict Kensington Market, as well as interviews with Toronto Jews who grew up in the city and faced anti-Semitism in school. Some well-known Toronto Jews, including entrepreneur Ed Mirvish, Mayor Mel Lastman and former York University president Harry Arthurs also share their insights about Toronto Jewry in the first half of the 20th century.

Nobody Swings on Sunday is not just a chronicle of anti-Semitism, although it does touch on some of the salient aspects of being a Jewish immigrant in a Protestant world – a world encapsulated by a black-and-white photograph depicting four women sitting by a banner stating proudly that they lost 28 sons between them to World War I.

Rasky's film is a lovely elegy to the past, imbued with such anecdotes as his (illiterate) grandmother's brush with the law over her snatching of the neighbours' newspapers – not to read, but to fuel her stove.

For every sobering fact presented in the film – such as Jews not being able to enter the teaching profession – there is a delightful memory brought to life through Rasky's narration and the use of black-and-white photographs.

Among these are several striking pictures of old movie palaces in an area that used to brim with them: for a nickel, people would escape the difficulties of their lives and head to the St. Clair or the Oakwood to watch movies.

Dummy is a warm-hearted Jewish family drama

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Dummy, an off-beat comedy directed by Greg Pritikin, is bound to warm hearts.

Premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival and scheduled to open here Sept. 26, Dummy revolves around family, romance and friendship.

It stars Adrien Brody as Steven Schoichet, a nice, awkward Jewish man whose life seems at a dead end.

He dislikes his job, and though he lives at home, he is lonely. Worse still, his parents treat him somewhat condescendingly.

What to do? He takes up ventriloquism. The dummy he buys becomes his alter ego and confidence builder. Strange but true.

Adrien Brody and Illeana Douglas in Dummy.

Adrien Brody, who went on to star in The Pianist after making this crowd-pleasing film, portrays the thirtyish Schoichet.

There are four women in his life: his imperturbable mother Fern (Jessica Walter), who constantly proffers cheese blintzes, the soul food of Jews; his unmarried sister, Heidi (Illeana Douglas), a wedding planner who recently broke off her engagement to an accountant; Fangora (Milla Jovovich), an eccentric rock musician; and Lorena (Vera Farmiga), an employment counsellor.

Fern flits in and out of scenes as the proverbial Jewish mother. Heidi makes occasional but pivotal appearances as a woman enveloped in a web of frustration.

The most engaging sub-plots, however, concern Lorena and Fangora.

Schoichet ardently woos Lorena, a single mother, but his romantic techniques are rather primitive. The police issue a restraining order, but this hardly deters him.

When he finally brings Lorena home for a Friday night meal, his inquisitive mother bombards Lorena with a litany of questions. The most important ones concern Lorena's background.

"Are you Jewish?"

Lorena replies, "No, Italian."

To which Fern retorts, "Same thing."

Fangora, a feisty musician whose language is salted with epithets, is the most unusual character in the film.

When she decides to incorporate klezmer music into her band's repertoire, she stays up nights reading The Joys of Yiddish.

In short order, Fangora, incongruously enough, is belting out Shein Vi Di L'Vone and other standard Jewish hits from weddings and bar mitzvahs.

Unfortunately, Jovovich's pronunciation of Yiddish is simply atrocious. She should have fired her dialect coach.

But this is a mere quibble. Dummy is expertly directed, and the performances ring true.

Filmmaker Anita Doron: from the Carpathians to Canada

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Anita Doron is a storyteller who happens to be a filmmaker.

A published poet who has been writing since the age of five, she said, "I don't want to make films because it's cool or funky, but because I want to inspire people and take them into different worlds."

With Not a Fish Story, a 23-minute short screened at the recent Toronto International Film Festival, Doron breaks new ground as a teller of tales and movie director.

Anita Doron

Not a Fish Story, which was showcased in the Perspectives Canada category, is bizarre, surreal, amusing and instructive.

Facing what appears to be a mid-life crisis, a man decides to transform himself into a fish. He builds a large aquarium in his basement and sets about becoming an amphibian.

Rose, his wife, is dumbfounded. But she comes around and helps her husband. In doing so, she liberates herself and finds true happiness.

"For me, it's about a woman who's stronger than she thought," said Doron, a 29-year-old honours graduate of Ryerson University's film studies program. "She copes with a new situation and starts a new, more fulfilling life."

Doron, whose parents live on a kibbutz close to Israel's border with Lebanon, originally wrote Not a Fish Story as a short story.

At Ryerson, thanks to grants from the Ontario Arts Council and the National Film Board of Canada, she converted it into a movie.

Having obtained funds from the Ontario Film Development Corporation, she and her producer Jonathan Orson, plan to start production on a new short in October.

Entitled Elliot Smelliot, it revolves around a 12-year-old Jewish genius who falls for a 20-year-old student.

Doron, who settled in Toronto after marrying a Canadian freelance writer seven years ago, is also working on three feature films.

The first is a romantic comedy, God Help Us. The second, Kaleidoscope, takes place in Hungary before and during the Holoocaust, and is based on her grandmother's diary. The third, House of Dolls, turns on the quest of three obsessed doll collectors to find a rare porcelain doll.

Doron was born in the Carpathian town of Bergszasz, which was part of Hungary before World War I.

Armed with a Super 8 camera, she made her first film at the age of 12. It was a documentary about a polluted river, and it annoyed the Soviet government.

But long before she discovered cinema, Doron was a compulsive writer, grinding out polished poetry good enough to be published in book form.

Her parents, Uri and Erika, both of whom are engineers, left the Soviet Union illegally. They arrived in Israel during the 1991 Gulf War.

They left the Soviet Union with three bags, all of which were lost en route. Today, they live on Kibbutz Hanita.

"My mother is from a traditional Jewish family. She always wanted to live in Israel," she explained. "My father was an atheist, but in Israel he found his identity as a Jew."

The first year was quite difficult. "The kibbutz is a closed society," she said. But gradually, all three adjusted.

While serving in the Israeli army, Doron took a video course, and this prompted her to study film. "The course was a marriage of words and images," said Doron. "I fell in love with it."

Upon completing her national service, she visited relatives in Canada. In Toronto, she met, then married, Jack Gerb, whom she describes as "this wonderful man."

They settled in Toronto after visiting Israel. Gerb, from Winnipeg, did not want to live in Israel.

At Ryerson, Doron acquitted herself brilliantly, winning the Norman Jewison Filmmaker Award, the Harvey Hart Director Award and the Applied Arts Award of Excellence.

Fresh out of Ryerson in 2001, she worked as a researcher for Atom Egoyan on the film Ararat.

Doron likes Canada. "It's such a tolerant, peaceful country." Yet she hopes to return to Israel so that she can be reunited with her parents. "It's very painful to be separated, but we'll try to find a way to be together."

Yet she is philosophical. "A filmmaker," she said, "can live anywhere."

Nobody Swings on Sunday
an elegy to Toronto's Jewish past

Another old building many people may not know about is the original Mt. Sinai Hospital, located in the Yorkville area. The hospital was created by Jewish women because their doctor husbands weren't able to get jobs at other hospitals. Rasky notes that the building is to be torn down soon.

Students that he lectures to today, Rasky says, can't believe Toronto has such a history of anti-Semitism. He counters this disbelief with an indisputable claim: "It happened. I was there."

He says that when he showed the documentary to his nieces and nephews, they were "troubled by it."

But he says it's important to know the history of our cities, which play such an important role in our lives.

"We're almost totally shaped by the city we live in," Rasky says. "I was highly shaped by the old neighbourhood. And I've never forgotten."

Mix of cultures highlights the music of Jeszcze Raz

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

The members of Jeszcze Raz have been entertaining Montreal audiences with their exuberant repertoire of klezmer, jazz, Polish, Middle Eastern and Gypsy music since 1995 and have distinguished themselves in the city's world-music scene.

Jeszcze Raz

Formed by Paul Kunigis, a former Israeli, the band records in five languages – Hebrew, Polish, Yiddish, Arabic and French. Its latest CD, Balagane, won a Juno Award in the world music category this year and sold about 15,000 copies.

Jeszcze Raz (pronounced yes-chay raz) is Polish for "once more" and is a substitute term for "happy birthday" in the Polish birthday song.

The source of Jeszcze Raz's multi-lingualism is Kunigis, the band's vocalist and piano player, who is credited with writing all the songs on Balagane. He has a mixed cultural and religious background in which worlds collide.

Kunigis was born in Poland to a Jewish father, a highly decorated Polish Army officer, and a Roman Catholic mother. His father, Misha, was in the Russian army at the onset of World War II and was repatriated to the Polish army at the end of the war.

"There were quite a few Jewish officers in the Russian and Polish armies," Kunigis says.

In 1957, when he was three years old, the family immigrated to Israel. Kunigis, who had a bar mitzvah and a first communion, says he was comfortable being raised in two religious traditions. "It was a natural thing. I went to church and I went to synagogue."

He recalls that his father and his former Red Army buddies used to sing into the wee hours of the morning while the Johnny Walker flowed on weekends at the family's home in Ramat Gan.

Kunigis, a self-taught musician, counts his father among his musical influences.

Kunigis left Israel for Toronto to study linguistics and history at York University, and after graduation worked in the travel industry. A job transfer took him to Montreal.

Nine years ago, at 40, Kunigis decided to make music a full-time career.

His father was shocked that he quit a stable job for an insecure profession.

"Luckily, I had the opportunity to do a couple of shows before he died," Kunigis says, adding that his father could see that his efforts to teach his son about his heritage hadn't been wasted.

Indeed, the ability to understand several languages and several cultures is one of the best gifts his parents could have given him, Kunigis says.

He tries to convey the importance of tradition in his songwriting and he hopes to convey it to his children, Alexis, 3, and Arielle, 14 months.

"You can be who you want to be, but don't forget where you come from," he says.

The language Kunigis chooses for his lyrics is determined by a song's melody, he says. The woeful title song of the band's CD Balagane (meaning Chaos), about Middle Eastern politics, is suited to Hebrew, while "the Polish songs are more nostalgic, because I left there when I was three."

Along with Kunigis, Jeszcze Raz also includes four English and French Quebecers and a Romanian violinist.

"A good United Nations," he says. "And they're all expected to speak Polish and Hebrew."

Recently, an audience of 800 sang along with the band in Polish, and they've had Arabs and Jews in the audience singing side by side.

The band attracts audiences of all ages, including at a recent show three generations of one family – a daughter, a mother and a grandmother – aged 7 to 77. "The young people trip on the rhythms and the different way of dancing," Kunigis says. "And for the older people, it gives them something they're familiar with."

Jeszcze Raz performs at the Lula Lounge, 1585 Dundas St. W., on Sept. 30, as part of the Small World Music Festival. For tickets, call 416-973-4000.

Panel examines myths surrounding SARS, West Nile

By ADI NEUBERGER
Special to The CJN

We can put away our face masks and breathe easier, as it seems SARS – severe acute respiratory syndrome – is not the threat health officials originally believed it be.

After extensive hands-on experience, health officials now maintain it can only be contracted through close contact with an infected person and is not an airborne threat, as initially feared.

In fact, the risk to the public at large of contracting SARS is quite small, said Dr. Andrew Simor, head of Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre department of microbiology, during a panel discussion sponsored by the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science last week in Toronto.

The panel examined the misconceptions and fears surrounding SARS, West Nile virus and mad cow disease, the triumvirate of illnesses that received a great deal of attention last spring and summer.

"The major risk to the public has always been those [SARS] cases that go unrecognized," said Simor, who was a key player in Toronto's fight against the disease.

During the SARS crisis, fears escalated when it was learned that people arriving here from Asia had carried the disease with them. Canadian airports were subjected to extraordinary SARS-related precautions, causing unprecedented travel delays.

But we now know only 14 per cent of infected Canadians contracted the disease while travelling, Simor said. "The situation we saw at Canadian airports was caused more by political pressures than health considerations."

Fears of West Nile may have been similarly exaggerated, the panel heard. As of September 2003, there have been 409 confirmed cases of West Nile in Ontario, though most of the people infected have not exhibited serious signs of the disease, said Harvey Artsob, Health Canada's director of the zoonotic diseases and special pathogens program at the National Microbiology Laboratory.

For every 150 people infected, 80 per cent show no symptoms, while less than one per cent end up with serious central nervous system complications.

"While we still view West Nile as a serious disease, especially among the elderly and those with compromised immune systems, we are not as concerned about the general population," Artsob said.

He also revealed that the initial North American outbreak of West Nile in 1999 was accompanied by suspicions of bio-terrorism until scientific investigation proved otherwise.

"There was a report associated with Iraq that listed West Nile as a possible agent of bio-terrorism," said Artsob.

Later, experts determined that it most likely entered the United States on an infected mosquito or bird, coincidentally one that may have come from Israel.

The panel of doctors also included Yuval Shaked, a fellow at Sunnybrook and Women's College department of molecular cell biology, and Graham Sher, CEO of Canadian Blood Services.

280 pints - and counting - for blood donor, 60

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Retired hair stylist Morton Allan Cohen has been giving blood for more than 40 years.

Morton Allan Cohen

To date, the 60-year-old has donated 280 pints.

"I guess I've been a mitzvah boy all my life," Cohen says.

Born in Fredericton and raised in Saint John, N.B., where, he says, "almost all the people there are my relatives," he came to Toronto in 1981.

"I love Toronto. Today, there are very few Jews left in Fredericton and Saint John."

Cohen says he realized the serious need for blood when he was a teenager.

"One night, I received a call from the hospital in Fredericton telling me that they needed my blood type. A girl of three months was dying and needed a transfusion of ORH-positive blood.

"I went down to the hospital, gave my blood and the baby survived. So I thought, why couldn't I do it for other people too?"

Over the years, he has been called on many occasions to donate because of his blood type.

Cohen is the son of Lillian Budovitch and the late Israel Cohen. Both sets of grandparents came to New Brunswick in 1914.

He is very proud of his family.

"My late grandfather, Myron Cohen of Saint John was a member of Parliament. My aunt is Senator Erminie Cohen of Saint John and my brother Warren Cohen is a past president of the Sgoolai Israel Synagogue in Fredericton, just to name a few."

Cohen graduated from Wilfred Beauty School in New York, where he received an honours degree in hairdressing.

In Toronto, he worked at Terrace Beauty Salon, but gave up his career because of a back problem. He is now a volunteer hairdresser at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"When I work at Baycrest, the bubbies and zaides give me tips, but I don't like to accept them," he says. "I give it all to Israel."

He says he gives blood as frequently as he can. "And if I could, I would give more."

He also volunteers on the telephones for Canadian Blood Services. It has given him several awards for his commitment to the blood program.

Cohen also volunteers for the United Jewish Appeal campaign and has been a member of B'nai Brith's Leonard Mayzel Lodge for 26 years.

Cohen says it's important to help others by donating both time and money, and says he hopes others will follow his example and donate much-needed blood.

10-year-old Jewish girls being sought for Important Research Study

Dr. Nora Gold, a visiting scholar at the Centre for Women's Studies in education at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, University of Toronto (OISE/UT), is seeking 10-year-old Jewish girls for an important research study she is conducting on Canadian Jewish girls. Dr. Gold has received funding from the Social Science and Humanities Research Council of Canada to conduct the first 3 years of a 9-year study on Jewish girls. The purpose of this research is to learn about the experience of growing up nowadays as a Jewish girl, and this is the first major study on this topic in Canada or anywhere else. The girls who take part in this study will meet once each year with Dr. Gold for an individual interview lasting about 1 1/4 hours, as well as once each year for a group meeting with 7 other girls, lasting about 2 hours. What the girls say or do in these meetings will remain confidential, and no individual participant will at any point be identifiable in any of the publications or lectures presented about this research. The girls participating in this study will receive an honorarium of $25. per year, plus $20 for each interview or focus group attended. If you are interested, please contact Dr. Nora Gold at 416-920-6904, or msgoldn@pluto.mscc.huji.ac.il.

Toronto teens haul home medals from Maccabi Games

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

Swimmer Adam Eilat led a strong Toronto swim team at the recently concluded JCC Maccabi Games, returning home with a medal haul that included 10 golds and one silver.

His teammates on the swim squad added six other gold medals, seven silver and four bronze.

Overall, teen athletes representing the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) capped months of hard work and perseverance with an impressive medal haul at the Tenafly, N.J., games.

Also represented on the winner's podium were the girl's soccer squad, the female basketball team and the boys' baseball team, each of which won silver medals.

In tennis, Toronto athletes recorded sweeps, winning gold, silver and a bronze medals in both male and female events.

Not to be outdone, the golf team drove and putted their way to two golds in the boys 15-16 category, while the 13-14 males brought home two bronzes.

Meanwhile, on the track, Toronto athletes reached the winner's circle with two golds and a silver.

"The games went quite successfully, and the power outage hit in New Jersey, but luckily, it didn't affect the games," said Grant Smith, head of the BJCC delegation. "The girls' soccer team, which won bronze last year, took home the silver, and our swimmers did really well in winning the overall meet."

Out of the approximately 80 athletes who took the 10-hour bus ride to New Jersey, about half were rookies who, Smith said, had only positive things to say about the experience.

"The kids came back with a big smile, and the experience is something they will cherish for life. Parents called already asking about next year," he said.

The weekend competition kicked off at the Continental Airlines Arena with opening ceremonies that saw athletes march in city by city.

In total, 40 teams participated in the games, representing communities in the United States, Israel, Canada, Mexico, Britain and Venezuela.

In addition to the sports competition, participants were treated to cultural activities that included a host family night, a carnival and an NBA jam session.

"In all my years, I have never met anyone who didn't have a good time, and that's what it's all about," Smith said.

With the games barely concluded, attention is turning to next summer's event in Boston and Smith said organizers are already in contact with the coaches.

Teens who want to try out for next year's team can contact Smith at 416-636-1880.

New magazine focuses on ‘geezer’ skateboarding

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

About 30 to 40 years ago, a curious juxtaposition of wealth and rebelliousness was taking form in middle class communities of southern California and Florida.

A group of young dudes, some with experience at the quintessentially Californian pursuit of surfing, were surreptitiously developing a new sport and the outlaw attitude that went with it. These people, from Modesto to Miami, were taking their skateboards into empty pools in middle class neighbourhoods, into pipes, culverts, and other concrete playgrounds, and performing death-defying jumps, twists and turns.

Often shooed away from their temporary playgrounds by homeowners and security staff, they created the charisma and aura that has since attached itself to the sport of skateboarding.

Today, millions of teenagers – and those a little older – have become skateboarding aficionados, as the sport has spread throughout the United States into Canada and as far afield as Europe.

While the sport, with its flirtation with danger and the ever-present risk of injury on unforgiving concrete surfaces, continues to be most popular among the younger set, there are still plenty of skaters in their 30s, 40s and even 50s who enjoy the exhilaration and freedom it brings.

At 39, Michael Brooke finds himself in the middle of that mature skateboarding demographic. He understands their nostalgia about past exploits along with their interest in current developments.

Recently, Brooke introduced a glossy and colourful new magazine to the skateboarding scene. Called Concrete Wave, the publication appears five times a year and is geared specifically to older skaters – “skate geezers” as he calls them.

It debuted in the United States in the summer of 2002 and arrived on Canadian magazine shelves this month.

Brooke acknowledges there is no shortage of skateboarding magazines, but says they are geared primarily to a younger crowd with an average age of 15.

“While most publications are content to show rails and ledges [used by skaters to perform incredible stunts] and to appeal to a younger demographic, Concrete Wave exists for those skaters who are looking for something a little different… Concrete Wave covers the widest variety of skateboarding possible: vertical, slalom, freestyle, downhill, longboarding and of course, old school,” Brooke says.

Brooke, who’s been skating for 28 years, says 85 per cent of skaters are under 18, and a vast marketing effort is geared toward enticing them into making purchases in the $2-billion industry.

At 39, Michael Brooke is well on his way to becoming a skate geezer

Over the years, the sport has developed its own roster of stars – recall the popularity of Tony Hawk, brought in last year to perform at a Toronto Argos game – as well as its own culture, mentality and even look, Brooke says.

The sport’s graphic look, with its extreme colours and cartoonish characters sprayed onto boards, is definitely meant to appeal to teenage skaters, he says.

The culture and mentality is certainly one of the rebels breaking the rules, avoiding law enforcement and skating where they shouldn’t be. Back in the 1960s, that often meant that in warm-weather climates, skaters would search out empty pools and use them as their own private parks until chased away.

One skater featured in the fall issue of the magazine, Tom “Wally” Inouye, was famous for his Inouye’s Pool Service, which appeared to be a legitimate business but which he used to drain pools in southern California so they could be used for skateboarding.

“There was a feeling that if they were caught, the cops will crack heads,” says Brooke, who says he was kicked out of the Yorkdale Shopping Centre parking lot not too long ago.

Today, civic leaders everywhere are trying to accommodate skaters: in Mississauga, a dedicated skateboarding park has been built near the Hershey Centre, while another venue has sprung up in the Leslie Street and Cummer Avenue area of North York.

Still, “you can skateboard anywhere there is a smooth surface,” says Brooke, who still gets out on his board pretty much every day in the summer.

Skateboarding has enjoyed waves of popularity, starting in the early 1960s, when millions of boards were sold.

A second boom took place between 1975 and 1979, with 20 million people worldwide taking up the sport. From 1985 to 1989 the sport again enjoyed wide popularity and then in 1995, it experienced its biggest explosion in popularity, one that’s lasted until today.

Back in 1977, Alan Gelfand became one of competitive skateboarding’s pioneering figures. A resident of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., Gelfand developed “the Ollie,” a trick that revolutionized the sport.

Gelfand, who’s Jewish, pressed his weight on the back of the board and popped it up in the air and rode the edge of a pool. He was able to get great height and such total control of the board that “people though he had velcro on his feet,” Brooke says.

Brooke was part of the 1970s boom and he has introduced the sport to his two oldest kids, aged nine and seven. His two-year-old has already balanced on a board.

Brooke hopes his kids take to the sport the way he did, but knowing how rebellious skaters are, he worries that “my kids will rebel against me by taking up golf.”

'It's never too late'

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

Rosh Hashanah is a time for new beginnings and decisions. This year, I figured it was the perfect time to (finally) get my own mezuzah. One of the reasons I still didn't have one was because I was embarrassed it had taken me to my 30s to finally do it. I knew the mitzvah of having a mezuzah was important, so I set out on my little journey to make it happen.

I found a scribe through my rabbi and set up an appointment. When I arrived at his house early one Sunday morning in the Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue area, I saw the biggest mezuzah I had ever seen in my life, so I assumed I was at the right place. I was led into a room that was jam-packed with boxes overflowing with tfillin, their leather straps hanging over the edges. There were shelves and shelves of tzitzit, challah covers hanging from the walls and mezuzot as far as the eye could see.

I decided on a pretty marine blue mezuzah and handed it over to the friendly looking rabbi sitting at the back of the room so he could put in the scroll. He could tell I was embarrassed when I asked him what blessing I should say when attaching it to my doorpost.

"Is this your first one?" he asked me. I nodded nervously.

"But what about the other doorways of your home? They all need one," he said.

But after he saw the look on my face, he said, "It's never too late to do what you're doing. It's wonderful, and in time, you can cover all the doorposts. It is a mitzvah and you should not be embarrassed."

I felt better and we talked for a few minutes. He generously invited me to spend Shabbat with him and his family after the holidays and I accepted. (Every rabbi I have ever met has invited me over for Shabbat and I have accepted every invitation!) I told him I would return when I was ready to put mezuzot on the other doorways of my apartment.

In the meantime, I am proud of my first mezuzah. Every time I enter or exit my apartment, I am reminded of what it stands for and that it is my new beginning for this Rosh Hashanah.

Shanah Tovah.

The Canadian Jewish news

They too were refugees

The youngest of the children descending the airplane is obviously frightened. She has arrived, in the nighttime, after a long, disorienting flight to a place she does not know. But she is not alone. Her family is with her, and a strapping young soldier receives her, steadying her uncertain way, helping her tiny feet to negotiate the large steps down the side of the huge, hollow machine that brought her and her family through the sky to a new and strange land.

The year was 1950. The plane had come to Israel from Yemen.

In the two years since the creation of the sovereign Jewish state, thousands had already arrived in Israel. Hundreds of thousands more were on their way.

They came – and would come still for many years – from Algeria, Egypt, Iraq, Iran, Libya, Morocco, Syria, Tunisia and Yemen.

To be sure, not all of the immigrants from Arab countries during the period after Israel's birth were refugees. Many rushed, with all their heart and soul, to join their destiny to that of the nascent Jewish state.

But most were refugees, despised and displaced from countries where the cemeteries were filled with the graves of their ancestors.

Israel was their haven, their sanctuary from persecution and statelessness.

But because Israel received them, their stories were ignored by the international community and, ultimately, forgotten. But they too had names and faces and a history.

More than a half century later, it is well past time for us to recall that history.

Integrity of the historical record

Editorial

For its own sake, it is imperative that we retell the account of the expulsion of the Jews from Arab countries – and for the sake of the integrity of the historical record.

At a time when voices clamour for justice on behalf of the Arabs who were displaced by the founding of the State of Israel, very few voices clamour for justice on behalf of the Jews who were also displaced by the founding of the Jewish state.

This supplement, therefore, is entirely dedicated to the Jews who were once refugees from Arab countries and to the doing of justice on their behalf.

We hope it will be a reference document that chronicles the history and the plight of the former Jewish refugees. In it, we have assembled essays from some of the most renowned scholars in the field.

Maurice Roumani provides an introductory overview, in which he makes the very forceful point that "Jews too have legitimate rights in the Middle East." Malka Hillel Shulewitz has written about the national, cultural and religious context to the expulsion. Sarah Taieb Carlen gives a comprehensive history of the Jews of North Africa (the Maghreb). Judy Feld Carr brings her unique expertise to bear upon a history of the Jews of Syria. And we have reprinted an excerpt from our archives written more than 20 years ago by Donald Carr, in which he pointedly pleaded for reparations for these displaced Jews.

We have also published a series of personal testimonies from individuals and families. Staff reporter Anna Morgan has poignantly captured the stories of seven different families who were part of the mass expulsions. The celebrated author Naim Kattan also tells of his past in Iraq.

As one of the crowning elements to this keepsake supplement, we have reprinted an abridged version of the outstanding report Jewish Refugees from Arab Countries: The Case for Rights and Redress, recently prepared by David Matas and Stanley A. Urman.

The report was written for Justice for Jews from Arab Countries, a non-governmental social action committee that is trying to raise the world's awareness about this sorely neglected group of people.

Our aim is to help bring this injustice to the attention of the world. Achieving that aim starts with us. For as Don Carr wrote 23 years ago, "If Jews are ignorant about this situation, how can the rest of the world be expected to know?"

We will be ignorant no longer.

Shanah Tovah.

The Jewish refugees from Arab countries: time to settle accounts

By MAURICE M. ROUMANI

The road map peace plan of President George W. Bush's administration signalled yet another attempt to solve the protracted conflict in the Middle East. To be sure, earlier American plans fell short of forging a settlement between the warring parties in the region. A solution was elusive, in part because it ignored the complex nature of the conflict. While it looked like a conflict between two contradictory nationalisms, in effect the conflict also had an undercurrent of a long history of religious antagonism that at times boiled over, costing Jewish lives and property.

New Year

For decades, the warring parties tried to ignore the religious factor in the conflict, but today more than ever before, they have come to realize that no solution to the conflict can be found without addressing both issues, the religious and the nationalist, preferably simultaneously.

The Arab-Israeli conflict is inherently a Muslim-Jewish conflict, even though people are reluctant to admit it. The modern nation-state in the Middle East is a recent import from Europe, and therefore it is to be expected that religion, Islam in this case, predominates in the minds and behaviour of people.

One of the salient examples of this behaviour is the majority-minority relationship in the Arab world from the time of the prophet Mohammed to our own days. The Qu'ran specifically states: "Fight against those to whom the Scriptures were given, who believe not in Allah nor in the Last Day, who forbid not what Allah and His apostle have forbidden, and follow not the true faith, until they pay the tribute out of hand, and are humbled" (Sura 9:29).

By paying the "tribute," a poll tax, Jews were given protection as long as they were "humbled." Over the centuries, this came to mean discriminatory laws against non-Muslim believers, even if they belonged to the monotheistic religions.

When, a few years ago, an eminent Egyptian scholar, Sa'ad al-Din Ibrahim, head of the prestigious research centre Ibn Khaldun in Cairo, called for an international conference on the status of minorities in the Arab world, according to Tel Aviv University professor Ofra Bengio, he attracted such heavy criticism from Arab intellectuals and politicians that his life was put in jeopardy and charges of treason were levelled against him. Under these circumstances, the conference could not be held in Cairo and instead was held in Cyprus.

This came as no surprise to those who have studied the subject or to those who lived as a minority in one of the Arab countries.

The treatment of Jews and Christians as dhimmi (protected minorities) in the Muslim world for almost 14 centuries only proves that the majority-minority status perceived by the Arabs did not cease with the establishment of Israel by the United Nations in 1947. The inadmissibility of Jews as a free and independent entity in the region has governed the policies of the Arab states since the creation of the State of Israel in 1948.

'Jews found themselves unwelcome and persecuted in the Arab countries'

In 1987, the editor of the newspaper Tishrin, who was the spokesperson for the late Syrian president Hafez al-Assad, was asked in a lecture given at the University of Maryland whether Syria was ready to accept Jews as an independent entity in the Middle East. He reflected, and with strong conviction, he asserted that "for the Arabs, Jews are a religion and not a nation."

This statement is not derived from recent events, which shaped the map of the Middle East after the defeat of the Ottoman Empire during World War I. It is deeply rooted in the Qu'ran where Jews are accepted only in the framework of being dhimmis. Many Arabs, and others, will deny that 20th-century Arab policies towards Jews and the new Israeli state stemmed from this religious dictum, but the facts leave very little room for any other interpretation. The treatment meted out to the Jews by their Arab host countries over the past 14 centuries testifies to their inferior status and persecution.

To be sure, Jews under Islam, especially during the classical period and part of the Middle Ages in Spain, fared better than those under Christianity. Passages in the Qu'ran and the Hadith (a compilation of the teachings and actions of Mohammed collected by his followers) attest to tolerance and benevolence towards Jews and other religions. However, these passages are rarely quoted by the clerics in addressing the community of believers. They are only addressed in forums where the interlocutor tries to show how Islam is a tolerant religion. In most cases, and especially in recent times with the rise and expansion of Islamic extremist groups, one hardly hears any of these passages. Although they exist for everyone to see and learn, the other diatribe passages against Jews, from the time of the battle of the prophet Mohammed with the three prominent Jewish tribes in Arabia, are often quoted and brought to bear on Arab states' public policies and pronouncements.

> 'For the Arabs, Jews are a religion and not a nation'

But there were also periods in which minorities in general and Jews in particular were persecuted, forced to convert to Islam or even put to death.

The Arabs' rejection of the United Nations' resolution to create an independent Jewish entity in the Middle East was tantamount to the inadmissibility of a change in the status of the Jews in the eyes of the Arabs. Although rooted in the distant past of Muslim history and enshrined in the sacred Qu'ran, the dhimmi status accorded to Jews and Christians is hardly addressed by modern Arab political thought, but it seems to linger in the subconscious behaviour of many Arabs in their attitudes to, perception of and treatment of Jews, especially those living in Israel today.

There was, nevertheless, a brief period in medieval history when members of the three religions, Judaism, Christianity and Islam, lived in harmony, flourished and cross-fertilized each other in many fields, such as literature, philosophy, mathematics and medicine. As a result, during part of the Middle Ages, Jewish communities flourished and a few of their leaders rose to high positions in the sultans' courts. This period was marked by economic, political and cultural expansions of the Muslim empire, in contrast to the declining periods of Muslim history when minorities suffered and were even persecuted.

The decline of the Ottoman Empire and in consequence of Islam, the onset of colonialism and the rise of Arab nationalism, all generated a reaction that brought in its wake a stricter application of discriminatory laws against minorities and at times even persecutions.

The history of the Jews in Arab countries in modern times is a living monument to the misfortunes that befell these communities in the 20th century, especially after the Balfour Declaration of Nov. 2, 1917, which expressed sympathy for Zionism.

Jews who had lived in the region from the time of the destruction of the First Temple in 586 BCE, and definitely before the rise of Islam in the seventh century CE, found themselves unwelcome and persecuted in the Arab countries.They were systematically expelled from their birthplace according to a calculated plan shared by the majority of Arab states at the time. A new refugee problem was thus created.

‘Increasing evidence that the expulsion of Jews was planned’

These same Arab states, in 1948, created the Palestinian problem by inviting the Arabs who lived within the confines of the newly established state of Israel to leave their homes, join the Arab armies, and march triumphantly back to regain their homes after defeating Israel.

Like the Palestinians, Jews from Arab countries were uprooted and displaced to a distant land. The Jews were welcomed and settled permanently in their new homes. The Palestinians, however, most of whom had been dislocated only a few kilometres away from their home towns in an area where they shared the same culture, religion and climate, were rejected by their own brethren and kept in refugee camps to fester for decades.

By branding all Jews in Arab countries as Zionists, the Arab states caused them to flee their birthplace and seek refuge in Israel. The arrival of almost 600,000 Jews from the Arab countries of the Middle East and North Africa between 1948 and 1956, out of approximately 860,000 Jews living in these countries at the time, was the first major exodus in the region after World War II. What could have been an exchange of population between these Jews and the Palestinians who fled Israel or were expelled, turned into a protracted conflict the end of which is not yet in sight.

Of the 260,000 Jews who remained in these countries after 1956, more than 200,000 have left for Europe and the Americas. Today only a few thousand Jews are left in Morocco, Tunisia, Egypt and Syria, a very insignificant number by all accounts.

The countries of the Middle East

In the 20th century, discriminatory legislation, persecution and death sentences against Jews were carried out by Arab states, even though they were members of the United Nations. Jews in these countries were eventually expelled through legislation enacted for this purpose and specifically directed against Jews who were forced to leave behind, despite their protests, both communal and private possessions accumulated over long centuries of living in these countries.

In 1948, the number of Jews in Syria, Lebanon, Egypt, Iraq and Yemen was 279,000. In 1998, their number was estimated at 400 or even less.

> ‘By branding all Jews in Arab countries as Zionists, the Arab states caused them to flee their birthplace and seek refuge in Israel’

When the Ottoman Empire was defeated by the Allied powers of Europe in 1918, the different provinces came under European mandates and the situation of the Jews “remained satisfactory,” says Hayyim J. Cohen in The Jews of the Middle East, 1860-1972. But once these countries gained their independence and took an active part in the Palestinian issue prior to 1948, the situation of the Jews grew increasingly untenable.

Laws allegedly against all foreigners enforced political and economic restrictions, but in real fact, they affected mostly Jews, thus paving the way for their expulsion.

There is increasing evidence that the expulsion of Jews from Arab countries was planned at some stage in 1947 at the time of the UN partition plan, before the state of Israel was established in 1948. This decision followed the anti-Jewish riots and pogroms that took place against Jews in most Arab countries. The most notorious were in Iraq and Libya.

In Baghdad, on June 1 and 2, 1941, an Arab mob attacked Jews returning from synagogue, and by the time the mob had disbanded, more than 160 Jews were dead and 240 wounded; 86 Jewish enterprises were looted and 911 homes destroyed; and 14,500 Jews sustained material losses. Further outbreaks occurred in 1946 and in 1947 when legal restrictions on movement of Jews were enforced. The Jews of Libya suffered a similar fate.

In equating all Jews with Zionism, the Arab states, later supported by the Arab League, embarked on a campaign against their Jewish subjects that left them no choice but to leave or be expelled. Jews were forced to relinquish their rights, their properties and their possessions, which were confiscated, nationalized by the state, or simply taken by an Arab neighbour or business colleague. They left in most cases with a suitcase and a meagre sum of money, which amounted to 20 British pounds.

In Egypt, Syria and Iraq, laws were enacted for the purpose of depriving the Jews of their citizenship. Soon after, Jewish property was confiscated by the state without compensation. No appeals against these measures were allowed in any court of law. At the same time, Jewish businesses “such as banks, insurance companies, industrial plants and the like were nationalized by the state without any compensation,” writes Israel Supreme Court judge Haim H. Cohn in the essay Discrimination of Jewish Minorities in Arab Countries.

In 1938, Arabs attacked Jews in parts of Egypt, and a year later bombs were placed in a number of synagogues in Cairo. From 1945 on, the Jews’ situation deteriorated. In 1945, synagogues were burned down with their scrolls in Cairo, and a hospital and a seniors home were destroyed. In 1947, a law limiting commercial activities of non–nationals was allegedly directed at foreigners, but in fact it affected mostly Jews who were engaged in a wide range of business activities.

'In 1967, things got much worse'

In 1958, the Egyptian government turned against Jewish property, confiscating most of it under the false pretence that Jews as foreign nationals were exercising pressure on the Egyptian government through foreign concessions to obtain exit permits. Between June and November 1948, the situation deteriorated even further, costing Jewish lives and loss of property. On June 20, 1948, it is estimated about 34 Jews lost their lives and more than 80 were wounded in Cairo, Cohn says. In July of the same year, a mob attacked Jews in the streets leaving more that 250 killed and wounded.

Similar incidents happened in Iraq. Baghdad had known a thriving Jewish community, one of the most ancient in the Middle East since the exiles of Babylon in 586 CE. After Iraq gained its independence in 1932, nationalist forces, who in part were Arab refugees from Syria and Mandatory Palestine and were imbued with Nazi propaganda, turned against their Jewish subjects, restricting their options for employment and their ability to pursue a higher education. Sporadic anti-Jewish riots occurred, but the worst event was the pogrom (farhud) of 1941 in Baghdad, which left more than 180 Jews dead, several hundred wounded and communal and private property damaged or destroyed.

After the farhud, Jews in Iraq realized how precarious their situation was, but still thought the worst was behind them, since the riots had taken place at a time when Iraq had no government. However, their hopes were dashed. In a series of anti-Jewish activities, Jews realized how Iraq had changed for them. In 1946, a fatwa (religious edict) was published forbidding the sale of land to Jews in all Arab countries and in 1948, synagogues were pillaged and property destroyed.

When the state of Israel was established in 1948, Jews were arrested and brought before military courts and persecution of members of the community intensified. "Most of them were fined, other were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, and one was sentenced to death," according to Hayyim J. Cohen.

Between June 1950 and June 1951, 110,000 of the 130,000 Iraqi Jews left for Israel with 50 British pounds for each adult and 20 for a child, leaving behind property and wealth accumulated over two millennia, estimated at between $150 million and $200 million (US).

In 1967, things got much worse in both in those Arab countries bordering Israel and others farther away like Libya.

In Egypt there were mass arrests; people were detained for months and even years without warrant or other legal authority. When they were finally allowed to leave, their citizenship was taken away and their property confiscated.

"In 1968," writes Haim H. Cohn, "a law was passed in Iraq by which public notaries and registrars were enjoined from certifying or registering any disposition by a Jew of his property, and banks were enjoined from paying out to any Jew money deposited by him in excess of 100 dinars per month." Subsequently, several Jews were held on false charges of espionage, and nine were hanged in a public square with cheering crowds as with the recent Palestinian expressions of joy when Scud missiles fell on Tel Aviv during the Gulf War of 1991, or when suicide bombers killed innocent people in Israel during the past two years of the intifadah.

In Syria, as in Libya, Jewish cemeteries were destroyed and public highways were built over them. In the early '50s, the Arab states increasingly tightened their grip on the Jewish communities by closing Jewish schools and synagogues and prohibiting any Jewish education or public worship. In addition, Jews were not allowed to own motor vehicles or to drive them. Telephones were forbidden in Jewish homes or businesses.

‘Jews in North Africa came under Nazi control’

In reviewing these laws and other measures, Cohn concludes that “the Arab states disclose a conscious or subconscious desire to take revenge on Jews for the establishment or survival, or prosperity of the State of Israel for which they themselves are in many ways responsible.”

The countries of the Maghreb

According to one estimate, says Norman A. Stillman in The Jews of Arab Lands: A History and Source Book, two-thirds of all Jews in Arab countries lived in North Africa in 1939. Unlike their co-religionists in the Middle East, Jews in North Africa came under Nazi control with the assistance of the French and Italian colonial powers ruling at the time. “From Iraq to Morocco, Arab sympathizers had lain with the Axis, a fact not lost on the Jews of these countries.”

They also could hear the Mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin al-Husseini, broadcasting from Berlin calling upon the Arabs to “kill the Jews wherever you find them, for the love of God, history and religion,” Stillman writes.

As tension grew in Palestine between 1929 and 1939, so pressure and anti-Jewish feelings and activities intensified in the countries of North Africa. Under the pro-Nazi Vichy government, the first anti-Jewish attacks in Morocco had already begun in 1940.

The Jewish communities of the French Maghreb – Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and the Italian colony of Libya – could not recover fast enough from the pro-Nazi rule before they were dealt a series of blows that left them hopeless and helpless in any attempt to regain their stability and trust in living in these countries. From 1943, coinciding closely with the events in Palestine at the time, Jewish communities in these countries saw their hopes for harmony and perhaps a semblance of normalcy shattered by intensive anti-Jewish riots, destruction of communal and private property and loss of life. These events finally led to their emigration. Each of the Arab-Israeli wars of 1948, 1956 and 1967, brought the end of these Jewish communities closer.

> ‘As the Arab-Israeli conflict intensified, Moroccan Jews felt more insecure’

In Morocco, on June 4, 1948, riots broke out in the north, killing and injuring dozens of Jews. In 1959, Zionist activities became illegal, forcing many Jews to leave. In 1964, 30 Jewish courts were closed down, including the High Rabbinical Court, and Jewish schools were put under Muslim administration.

In 1912, Morocco came under French rule. The situation of the Jews improved. In June 1943, “43 Jews were murdered and pogroms and other forms of attack persisted until Moroccan independence in 1956,” writes Dr. Tudor Parfitt in a manuscript called The Jews of Arab Countries and Iran: A Survey. Laws were introduced making emigration illegal, but nevertheless, between 1955 and 1957, more than 70,000 Moroccan Jews arrived in Israel. When, in 1959, Zionist activities became illegal in Morocco, 30,000 Jews left for France and the Americas. In 1963, the ban on emigration was lifted and more than 100,000 Jews left the country.

As a consequence, the Jewish population of Morocco, which was estimated at 250,000 in 1948, was reduced to a mere 35,000 Jews in 1972. As the Arab-Israeli conflict intensified, Moroccan Jews felt more insecure and their situation became more precarious, despite the protection and tolerance shown by the monarch toward them. In 1998, it was estimated that only 6,000 Jews remained in Morocco.

Before 1948, 140,000 Jews lived in Algeria. Until 1962, there were 60 Jewish communities, each maintaining at least one synagogue, one rabbi and its own educational system. During the struggle for independence, pressure was placed on Jews to endorse the nationalist cause. A spokesperson for the Liberation party at the time declared in 1960 that Jews would endure the consequences of their hesitant attitude when Algeria came into being. Following the Evian Agreement that granted independence to Algeria, almost all of the Jews left the country, mainly for France, with fewer than 14,000 going to Israel.

As in Algeria, the rise of Tunisian nationalism led to anti-Jewish legislation in 1961, causing Jews to leave in great numbers. In 1948, the Tunisian Jewish community had numbered 105,000 with 65,000 living in the capital, Tunis, alone. By 1961, the total Jewish population had declined to 70,000, and in 1968, there were only 12,000 Jews left in Tunisia. Heightened anti-Jewish persecutions during the war of 1967 influenced even more Jews to leave for France and Israel.

The Jews of Tunisia constituted a wealthy, prestigious community, including at one time, as in Morocco, a member of Parliament. The change that occurred in government policies generated a fear and insecurity that caused most of the Jews to leave.

As in Iraq, the Jews of Libya, “whose presence in Cyrenaica can be claimed with certainty from not long after the reign of Ptolemy I in the third century [BCE],” according to Italian historian Renzo De Felice in Jews in an Arab Land Libya, 1835-1970, suffered a similar fate.

'Entire families were taken away from their homes'

The Libyan Jewish community, which numbered 36,000 in 1948, is an example of a community that left Libya en masse as a result of anti-Jewish activities, commercial restrictions and persecutions. With the outbreak of anti-Jewish riots in 1945 and then in 1948, the Jewish community witnessed a wave of pogroms unprecedented in its history. Between Nov. 4 and Nov. 7, 1945, a pogrom broke out, leaving 130 dead, 30 widows and 92 orphans, when the entire community at the time numbered 32,000 men, women and children. De Felice describes the pogrom as one with "unimaginable cruelty and some even burned alive… In some cases whole families were wiped out."

In another reference, De Felice states that in one of the towns, Qussabat, "many women and girls were raped, and many men and women, in order to save their lives, were compelled to abjure their faith and embrace Islam."

In 1948, another pogrom took place, "much less dramatic… than that of 1945" since it took place only in the city of Tripoli on much smaller scale and claimed fewer victims (14) and material damage. It was equally devastating, however, since it created panic and wreaked havoc among the Jewish population who had now, after the second pogrom, lost all hope of carrying on any semblance of daily routine.

The overwhelming majority of Libyan Jews, 34,000, immigrated to Israel, as many as 30,00 arriving by 1951. The 1967 war signaled the end of what was left of this small Jewish community. Here again on June 2, 1967, a few days before the outbreak of the war, the clerics incited the mobs by proclaiming "a holy war and gave sermons to this effect on the radio," De Felice says. Entire families were taken away from their homes, more than 100 shops were looted and 13 people were killed, seven of whom were from one family. After the police took control of the situation, the Italian Embassy and the offices of Alitalia in Tripoli airlifted the remaining Jews, who left behind their homes and possessions. In some cases, food was still cooking on the stove when they were taken away. Although they were penniless, Italy welcomed them as refugees, placing them in camps where they waited for their rehabilitation with the aid of international and Italian Jewish organizations.

The Jewish refugees: claims for compensation

U.S. congressmen, senators and former presidents Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton recognized that Jews from Arab countries, like the Palestinians, are also party to any settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict, says Malka Hillel Shulewitz, editor of The Forgotten Millions: The Modern Jewish Exodus from Arab Lands. The United Nations Security Council Resolution 242 emphasized that any settlement of the conflict in the Middle East should contain "a just settlement of the refugee problem." The resolution had as a goal to make no distinction between Palestinian Arabs and Jews from Arab countries.

For the past quarter of a century, the World Organization of Jews from Arab Countries (WOJAC), the American Jewish Committee and lately other Jewish organizations including the American Sephardi Federation of New York and the World Jewish Congress have raised the banner of the Jews from Arab countries as a settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict seemed to draw nearer.

> 'Jews have received no compensation for their property and their suffering'

The resettlement of Jews from Arab countries in Israel, which by a conservative estimate has cost $11 billion (US) so far, and the property, communal and private that they left or were forced to leave behind in their countries of birth, would have to be assessed in any settlement of the refugees. To date, Jews have received no compensation for their property and their suffering. The resettlement of these Jews in Israel was financed by the Israeli government, the Jewish Agency and world Jewish organizations. By contrast, the Palestinian refugees have been financed since 1948, by the UNRWA, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, with an annual budget of $311 million.

By recognizing the claims of the Jews from Arab countries to their rights, the Arab world, and for that matter the Muslim world, would come to recognize another important part of the equation – that Jews have legitimate rights to that part of the Middle East, their ancient homeland, as do Arabs to other parts of the Middle East, even if these were occupied and converted to Islam centuries ago. Paradoxically if the right of Jews to an independent national entity in the Middle East is recognized by the Arab neighbours, territorial boundaries will be as irrelevant as they were during that brief period of history called the Golden Age of Spain, when Muslims, Christians and Jews lived in harmony and made contributions to mankind, the effects of which are felt to this very day.

Maurice Roumani, born in Libya, a graduate of Brandeis University, the University of Chicago and the University of London, teaches political science and the Middle East at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev in Israel where he is also the founder and director of the J.R. Elyachar Centre for the Study of Sephardi Heritage. Roumani is the former secretary-general of WOJAC. He has held teaching and research positions at Harvard University, Hebrew University, Bar-Ilan University, George Washington University, the University of Maryland and the University of Rome.

Who are the Dhimmis? Exploding some myths

By MALKA HILLEL SHULEWITZ

Many are the myths that have embraced Islam over the centuries. Of these, the most dangerous is a belief in its tolerance, at least in relation to Christianity which, in 1215, when the Fourth Lateran Council met under the patronage of Pope Innocent III, decided that non-Christians would be separated from Christians by a special badge to be distinctively displayed on their outer-garments.

The pictures of Jews in Europe wearing the yellow Star of David and the word "Jude," often while being beaten up by Christian fanatics, is well-planted in our minds. The fact that Islam had enacted similar legislation as early as the eighth century, which was codified in the 11th century and became known as the Covenant (or Pact) of Omar, is rarely recognized.

The 19th-century historian Israel Abrahams, in his seminal work, Jewish Life in the Middle Ages, makes the interesting comment that "the badge was itself perhaps derived by Innocent III from the Mohammedans." Two pages later, Abrahams makes another observation after posing the question, "How stood the matter [distinctive dress] in realms where Islam held sway over men's conduct?" He responds, "The answer is saddening. For, though they themselves were fellow sufferers with the Jews in Spain, the Muslims felt little fellow-feeling for the Jew in the East and in the Levant. There was hardly a Mohammedan land in which the Jews were not compelled to live in a separate quarter and adopt some distinctiveness in dress. Under Islam, the Jews were forbidden to wear certain articles of dress, they were restricted in their choice of colours, they were forced to dress in black or yellow, and to appear bare-footed."

It is essential to trace the roots of discrimination in traditional Islam if we are to understand what is happening today:

- why there are virtually no Jews left in the Middle East (apart from those in Israel and a few thousand in North Africa) where they had resided and to which they had contributed mightily for at least 1,000 years before the rise of Islam;
- why the majority of the Christian communities in this part of the world have almost disappeared to form large Diasporas in the western world. Constituting about 13 per cent of the population of the Middle East around the time of World War 1, they have today dwindled to just two per cent, including natural increase over that period;
- why an Islamic empire that stretches over an area larger than Europe or the United States cannot tolerate in its midst a sovereign Jewish state that covers less than half of one per cent of that area, and refuses to find room to accommodate a few hundred thousand brother refugees created as a result of their own wars of aggression.

> 'It is essential to trace the roots of discrimination'

Islam made its debut in the seventh century in the Arabian peninsula, or Saudi Arabia as we know it today. Mohammed, its prophet, brought a new revelation, one which was, according to its own terms, the final revelation God had given to mankind and consequently a revelation whose teachings would supersede all previous revelations, particularly in Judaism and Christianity, due, as the Qu'ran mentions, to the rebelliousness of their followers. Islam, therefore, presented itself from the beginning as a teaching and a way of life that possessed an intrinsic superiority. It has maintained this attitude of superiority throughout its history, down to the present day. It is also important to understand that it came into being as a society and a polity, as well as a religion.

When the conquering armies of Islam were sweeping like a whirlwind through Arabia, they encountered many influential and long-established Jewish tribes. Mohammed greatly admired them. He was impressed by the knowledge that they had already received divine revelation in the Scriptures and he initially adopted many Jewish traditions and practices. Admiration turned into hostility when the Jews of Medina refused to accept the new faith. Since his was the culmination of prophetic history, he believed that the People of the Book (Jews and Christians) would readily accept his teachings and become integrated into his new polity. He assumed that Jews in particular would recognize "real" prophesy.

However, though the new religion bore a resemblance to and had borrowed some features from Judaism, the Jews refused to acknowledge the authenticity of Mohammed's prophetic claims. This was the cause of Mohammed's first great disappointment with the People of the Book at a time when he had eagerly expected them to accept the truth of Islam, which then recorded it as the Jews' early "treachery" and for which the Jews paid dearly.

Between 625 and 627, Mohammed made war on the opposing Jewish tribes. One of them, the Banu Quariza, was completely exterminated, while two others – the Banu Nadhir and Banu Qainuqa – were driven out of the peninsula. At that time, Mohammed began to give the inherited Jewish and Christian customs a more Arabian flavour or to discard them entirely. Though the Jews (and the Christians) were still recognized as People of the Book, the Muslims developed a hostile contempt for them as unbelievers and ironically turned against the Christians as well as the Jews.

'A series of regulations designed to separate Muslims from non-Muslims'

The Muslim attack on the Jewish oasis of Khaibar in 628 was of particular significance since it set a precedent for Muslim authority and a conquered non-Muslim people: the Jews of Khaibar were allowed to retain their land but had to pay a 50 per cent tribute. The Qu'ranic expression of this is found in the injunction (Sura 1X, 29): "Make war upon those who have received Scripture… until they pay tribute, being brought low," i.e. to a state of humiliation.

This, as mentioned, was, together with subsequent legislation, later codified in the 11th century as the Covenant of Omar. It comprised a series of regulations designed to separate Muslims from non-Muslims and guard the superiority of the former through the humiliation of the latter. Observance of these regulations was the price paid by "people of the Covenant," called dhimmis, for living under Muslim rule. How strictly these regulations were enforced depended on the benevolence of the ruler and how much his economy needed the sometimes superior experience of his dhimmis. It is perhaps interesting to note that, according to historian Jacob Marcus in his Jews in the Medieval World (Jewish Publication Society 1960), at least six of the Covenant of Omar's regulations were taken from earlier Byzantine Christian legislation against infidels.

It should be noted that under Islam, there were sizable numbers of Jewish and Christian subjects who attained high rank, financial influence and recognized intellectual attainment. There were indeed periods of flourishing Jewish achievement, as attested to by the Cairo Genizah, which has provided us with a rich record of intellectual and economic prosperity among different Oriental Jewish communities. However, this was the exception rather than the rule. The system of assuring Islamic superiority – legislated through the Covenant of Omar – ruled supreme. It established the dhimma (protected people) system for minorities.

Though the word jihad is now better understood in the West, the dhimmi condition is almost unknown, though the latter can only be comprehended in the context of jihad because it originates from this ideology.

The dhimma was the treaty concluded between Mohammed and those he subdued. Originally, they were tolerant pacts. In theory, dhimmis were guaranteed their lives and property, as well as their religious liberty, provided they did not transgress any of the dhimma's stipulations. But soon the dhimma became a codified system of legal tyranny that defined the status of the dhimmis, who had to pay the jizya (poll tax) symbolizing their subjugation to Islam, as well as higher commercial taxes than were paid by Muslims. Ownership of their land passed to the Muslim community; to have the right to cultivate it, they had to pay another tax. The construction of new churches or synagogues or the restoration of old ones, as well as the use of religious objects was forbidden. Dhimmis had to live in separate areas in inferior homes. Marriage or sexual intercourse with a Muslim woman and blasphemy against Islam were punishable by death. Dhimmis were not allowed to testify in court against a Muslim and could exercise no authority over one. Dhimmis had to go unarmed at great risk to their lives. The numerous decrees regulating the colour and shape of their clothes made them easily recognized and they were then humiliated in the streets.

Some indication of what this meant can be gauged from the following quote from a letter published in the Egyptian press during the intense rioting against Jews in Egypt that began in 1945 and intensified in 1948, when the letter was written:

“It would seem that most people in Egypt are unaware of the fact that among Egyptian Muslims there are some who have white skin. Every time I board a tram, I see people pointing at me and saying ‘Jew, Jew.’ I have been beaten more than once because of this. For that reason I humbly beg that my picture (enclosed) be published with an explanation that I am not Jewish and that my name is Adham Mustafa Galeb.”

Considering the foregoing, perhaps we can better understand what triggered the transfer of whole communities in our time. Why, in what could be described as the blink of a historic eyelid, we have witnessed the almost total dissolution of the Jewish people’s most ancient Diaspora, while only a minority of the once-proud Christian communities remains in the Muslim Arab Middle East. Since both the Jewish people and most Christians in the West have reacted so mildly to these major movements of populations and the discrimination that caused them, one can only assume that the dhimmi mentality was not confined to Muslim lands, but that a strain of it has infected the West.

It is no coincidence that Amrosi bin Nurhasin the Bali bomber, shouted, “Jews, remember Khaibar. The army of Mohammed is coming back to defeat you,” as he recently entered the courtroom for sentencing. Though there were no Jews among the slaughtered and wounded in Bali, the media did not understand that this Islamist mass murderer was referring to an important historic precedent (mentioned above, before the e-mail information about the Bali trial was received). It matters not to a radical Muslim that this happened in the seventh century. For him, it is relevant.

Hadith (communications or narrative), is the body of verbal or written traditions concerning the words and deeds of Mohammed and his companions. It can also be a single one of these traditions. Thus knowing the Hadith: “Two religions shall not remain together in the peninsula of the Arabs,” which justified the “cleansing” of the Hijaz (the region of what is now north-west Saudi Arabia where Mecca is located) of Jews and Christians in 640 is basic to comprehending why the Bali bomber, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat or the Saudi princes aim at “cleansing” Israel of its Jews. Whether we are in Judea, Samaria or the Golan Heights is irrelevant except insofar as our presence makes us less vulnerable to Muslim attack and Islam’s “final solution” – a “natural” return to dhimmitude.

In the halls of the pro-Arab foreign ministries of the West, they should take note of a saying popular in the Middle East: “First the Saturday then the Sunday people.” The Islamists mean it. It is time to stand up and be counted among those who will block the advance of the reactionary forces of dhimmitude before it is too late.

What about reparations for Jewish refugees?

The following is excerpted from an article that was published in The CJN, Sept. 4, 1980.

By DON CARR

One distortion [about Israel] has resulted from a wall of silence. The Arabs have readily acceded to this silence. But the blame must fall upon us and our leadership throughout the world for keeping the rest of the world and our own people in ignorance.

While much has been made of the Palestinian Arab refugees, nothing – or virtually nothing – has been heard about a parallel problem, as great in number and in physical hardship, but far greater in terms of loss of material possessions and persecution. That is the problem of Jewish refugees from Arab countries.

Because of the determined efforts of the Arab countries to perpetuate the status of their brothers as refugees, they have succeeded in promoting world sympathy. This was achieved by herding the Palestinians into refugee camps, denying them the right or ability to create new lives for themselves, insisting that they, their children and their grandchildren, remain on the relief rolls of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) and, latterly, as the PLO has grown, by maintaining them in camps intermingled with terrorist training bases.

Notwithstanding the callous and deliberate creation by the Arab states of a refugee problem that could have been easily solved by them, the rest of the world has felt pity. Instead of insisting that the Arab states do something, they have insisted that Israel provide the remedy. This does not mean compensating the refugees. It means taking them back into a state they have sworn to destroy, or permitting them to create a state that will clearly be directed by the PLO and will form a base for terrorist actions against Israel and its ultimate destruction.

The Palestinian refugees constitute less than one per cent of the entire Middle East Arab population. They have always been and are now in an environment where the people share the same language, religion, tradition and lifestyle. The Arab from Haifa or Nablus is no different from one who lives in Amman. Jordan's present prime minister is a Palestinian.

As late as March 1977, Zuhair Mohsin, the leader of the PLO terrorist group known as "as-Saiqa," stated: "There is in fact not a separate Palestinian people. Jordanians, Palestinians, Syrians and Lebanese do not differ. We are part of a people, the Arab nation. We are one people; only for political reasons we carefully stress our Palestinian identity. For it is in the national interest of the Arabs to encourage the Palestinian existence against Zionism. Yes, the existence of a separate Palestinian identity serves only tactical reasons. The foundation of a Palestinian state is a new tool to continue to battle against Israel and for Arab unity."

The above notwithstanding, none of the Arab host countries, with the exception of Jordan, offered citizenship to the refugees. All UN proposals since 1949 for resettlement of the refugees have been rejected by the Arabs.

While controversy exists over the exact number of Arab refugees (an official census was never permitted by Arab administrators in charge of refugee camps), it is generally accepted that in 1948, there were between 500,000 and 650,000 Arabs who left what became Israel. In 1967, another 250,000 were reported as being refugees as a consequence of the Six Day War. Therefore, approximately 750,000 to 900,000 Arabs were displaced during the two periods of battle.

UNRWA has shown strikingly higher figures. This has resulted from the addition of offspring and children of offspring and the non-reporting of deaths. At one time, the statistical discrepancy of UNRWA's figures was so high that it was forced to delete more than 425,000 names from its records.

UNRWA has spent almost $1.4 billion (of which some 70 per cent comes from the United States) from May 1950 to date on the maintenance of Arab refugees. The 22 independent Arab states combined have contributed less than five per cent of this amount, while their oil revenues have reached hundreds of billions of dollars.

In contrast, Israel has contributed nearly $10 million to UNRWA – that is one-third more than the total contribution of Kuwait, two-thirds more than Egypt, twice the contribution of Jordan, 3½ times that of Syria and almost seven times that of Iraq.

The hidden, unfamiliar story is that of the Jews who became refugees from Arab countries.

The history of the persecution of Jews in Arab countries goes back to the seventh century. (Please see the essays by Maurice M. Roumani, Malka Hillel Shulewitz and Sarah Taieb Carlen in this supplement for more detailed accounts of that persecution.)

As dhimmis (non-Muslim people of the Covenant), they were subjected to regulations over the centuries… Prohibitions against them included building houses higher than those of the Muslims, riding horses, praying, mourning or burying their dead in a way that might be offensive to Muslims, drinking wine in a public place, bearing arms, acceptance of their oath in a Muslim court…

‘More than 750,000 Jews were compelled to flee’

Any suggestion that Arab oppression of Jews was brought about by political Zionism or the creation of the State of Israel is a myth.

In a speech to the American-Israel Public Affairs Committee in Washington, D.C. on May 8, 1979, Senator Lowell Weicker referred to the increasing frequency with which the Arab states argue that the Palestinians are being made to suffer for an event (the Holocaust) in which they played no part.

While at first that may seem to be a compelling argument, Weicker pointed out that it was essential to counter the argument. “It is important that the victims of centuries of Arab pogroms be given a voice at last, and that the Americans be told that while Jews were murdered or looted or dispossessed in Russia, Latvia, Lithuania, the Ukraine, Poland and Germany, their brothers and sisters suffered a similar fate in Egypt and Syria and Iraq and Libya and elsewhere in the Arab world. Americans do not know that for every Palestinian refugee there is a Jewish refugee from an Arab land equally impoverished, equally dispossessed. These refugees don’t bomb buses and murder school children and hijack planes.”

> ‘Left behind were communal properties, schools, synagogues and most of their precious contents’

It must be recognized that the attitude toward the Jews in Arab lands subsequent to the Balfour Declaration and at the time of the creation of Israel, changed – for the worse. Intolerance and sporadic pogroms gave way to brutal and systemic persecution, particularly in Syria, Iraq, Egypt and Libya. Public executions were commonplace. Hate campaigns in the press and mass media, sometimes controlled by Arab governments and always encouraged by them, accompanied this set of circumstances.

Coincident to the Arab invasion of the new State of Israel, mass arrests, interrogation and beatings took place in Iraq, Egypt and Syria. Riots broke out in Morocco, Algeria, Libya, Tunisia, Yemen and Aden. Civil rights were suspended.

During the UN debate in 1947, the head of the Egyptian delegation declared: “The lives of a million Jews in Muslim countries will be jeopardized by the establishment of the Jewish state.”

The chairman of the Palestinian Arab Higher Executive stated: “If a Jewish state were established in Palestine, the position of the Jews in the Arab countries would become very precarious. Governments have always been unable to prevent mob excitement and violence.”

As a result, more than 750,000 Jews were compelled to flee the lands where their communities had existed for centuries prior to the birth of Mohammed and the Muslim conquest, lands where they had formed a part of the indigenous populations.

Left behind were communal properties, schools, synagogues and most of their precious contents. Homes and businesses that had not been confiscated were abandoned. Mordechai Ben Porat, former deputy speaker of the Knesset, and now chairman of the World Organization for Jews from Arab Countries (WOJAC) – himself a refugee from Iraq – says that “the landholdings that Jews were forced to abandon in the Arab countries constituted three per cent of all of the Arab world’s vast territory. This is far more than the entire State of Israel and the administered territories.”

The Jewish population in Arab countries estimated in 1948 at some 856,000 dwindled to some 25,000.

Where did they go?

Israel was a natural refuge for the majority. Some were able to get there independently. Others were part of a massive rescue mission organized by local communities as well as Israeli authorities.

The populations of Yemen and Iraq were airlifted to Israel between 1948 and 1951. Some 586,000 Jews from Arab countries arrived in Israel between May 1948 and May 1972. The balance found their way to France, England, the United States, South America and Canada.

The Jews who arrived in Israel came to a country lacking in natural resources, poor, burdened with economic difficulties and under attack by neighbouring Arab countries.

‘The absorption and resettlement of those refugees was not an unqualified success’

The bulk of the Jews then living in Israel were of European Ashkenazi origin. All they had in common with the refugees from the Arab countries was their religion and the need to survive.

Israel did not turn to the United Nations or UNRWA. With the assistance of world Jewry, everything that was possible was done to give Jewish refugees equal opportunity, and to resettle and absorb them.

The problem was gigantic. No other country in history ever attempted such a monumental task, and with so little resources available.

Between 1948 and 1951, the number of immigrants was almost the same as the total population of the new state at its creation in 1948.

The process of trying to integrate the new immigrants led to great suffering. They were originally housed in ma'abarot (transit camps), where thousands clustered in a small space, sheltered by huts and tents, and even cardboard shacks. Hunger, disease and illness were common.

In his book The Case of the Jews from Arab Countries: A Neglected Issue, Roumani writes: “The great majority of them [immigrants from Arab countries] were housed in tents which were drenched from above and flooded from below during the heavy rains of the winter of 1949-50. The original plan called for a sojourn of a few weeks only in the immigrants’ camps, after which each immigrant was to be sent to a permanent place of settlement. Actually, however, in view of the large number of immigrants, the rate of evacuation from the camps lagged behind the rate at which the new immigrants were brought into Israel, and the period of sojourn in the camps was prolonged from three months to four months to six months to eight months…

“One of the main immigrants’ reception camps was that of Rosh Ha’ayin, in which, at the height of its occupancy in 1950, there were some 15,000 Yemenite Jewish immigrants. They were all lodged in tents, 15 of them in each tent. The few buildings in the camp were used to house the hospital and the clinics, the babies’ homes, the kitchen and dining room, and the school.

“When the immigrants arrived, many of them were very weak. Mortality was high, and as many as 20 deaths occurred daily. In this respect, a definite improvement was noticeable very soon – mortality decreased.”

Over a period of years, the camps were cleared, settlement towns were built and the refugees moved into existing cities, towns and settlements.

It must be admitted – 30 years later – that the absorption and resettlement of those refugees was not an unqualified success.

The slums and depressed areas of Israel today, the overcrowding and lack of housing, the social problems, indeed the need for Project Renewal to upgrade the quality of life in Israel, are all direct outgrowths of the exodus of the Jews from the Arab countries. They and their offspring now form approximately 41 per cent of the population of Israel. When taking into account the immigration from Middle Eastern countries which are non-Arab – such as Iran and Turkey – the present population of Jews from the Middle East and their descendants are the majority in the state today.

In the exchange of population between Jews and Arabs in the Middle East since 1948, the Jewish side has suffered the heavier damage. The wealth abandoned by Jews in the Arab lands surpasses many times the property left behind by Arabs in Israel. The social losses and the religious treasures and facilities that Jews were compelled to leave behind them also exceed that of the Palestinian Arabs.

Resolution 242 of the United Nations Security Council, which is the foundation for settlement of the Arab-Israel conflict, includes in Paragraph 2 the affirmation of “the necessity… for achieving a just settlement of the refugee problem.”

Note the expression “the refugee problem,” not “the Arab refugee problem.”

claims commission for the mutual settlement of all financial claims."

Thus, almost unobtrusively, the key documents relating to peace in the Middle East make provision for consideration and settlement of claims that might be made by Jewish refugees from Arab countries and not merely by Palestinian Arab refugees.

Why have the Jews from Arab countries not risen up as a group to demand their rights to compensation from those countries which they were forced to flee and where they left behind millions of dollars of personal possessions and property?

By and large, they are an extremely proud group of people. They do not want to be classed as refugees. They stress the fact that they became integrated into the population of Israel, that it was their own people who supported them and they have never looked for handouts.

Although WOJAC has endeavoured to enlist support for its campaign on behalf of Jews from Arab countries, there has been non-systematic or organized tabulation of claims of those Jews whose property was confiscated or left behind when they fled, nor a tabulation of compensation that could be claimed for imprisonment, harassment and torture, nor an inventory of still-existing Jewish assets of spiritual, cultural or religious significance that should be returned to their rightful owners.

Only lip service has been paid, from time to time, by Jewish organizations in the Diaspora to this problem. Mordechai Ben-Porat was a member of the Israel delegation to the United Nations in late 1977 and early 1978 at its 32nd General Assembly. He spoke to the assembly on the rights of Jews who fled from Arab countries. In the U.S.-Israel working paper on the Geneva Conference in 1977, a passage was devoted to this issue and stated that "in any discussion of reparations for the refugees, Israel will raise the question of reparation for Jewish refugees from Arab lands, and insist that all their claims be settled within the framework of the final peace agreement."

At a press conference on Oct. 27, 1977, U.S. president Jimmy Carter said: "Yes, the Palestinians have rights… it is evident that there are also Jewish refugees… who have the same rights as others do."

Notwithstanding these statements, very little has been done by world Jewish organizations with respect to the rightful claims on the part of Jews who were forced to leave the Arab countries or the pitiful plight of those who still remain as hostage communities in countries such as Syria where emigration is prohibited, beatings, arrests, rape and looting are virtually an every day occurrence and the Jewish population is threatened with annihilation.

> 'Very little has been done by world Jewish organizations'

World Jewish Congress seems to ignore this issue on each agenda, does not publicize it and has not seen fit to create any committee to deal with it.

Canadian Jewish Congress has for the past several years had a national committee for Jews from Arab countries. A handful of dedicated workers in this cause are responsible for its perpetuation. However, on the scale of Congress' priorities, it does not appear to loom very large and few reports have been asked for by the national officers or the national executive.

No Holocaust memorial program, no Holocaust studies course tells the story of death and pillage of the Jews of the Middle East.

Malka Shulewitz of Jerusalem, an avid spokesperson for the cause of Jewish refugees from Arab countries, stated at the May 1980 congress plenary assembly in Toronto that, with all the world clamour for Palestinian Arab "rights," it was time the world heard about valid, urgent Jewish rights. She, Ben-Porat, WOJAC and their constituents are determined this should come about.

But if the Jews are ignorant about this situation, how can the rest of the world be expected to know about it and to be sympathetic to it?

The Jews of North Africa

By SARAH TAIEB CARLEN

The Jews have been mentioned as natives of North Africa ever since archeologists and historians started writing about that region of the world. "They are part of the flora and fauna," as some put it. While digging the foundations of the capital of their empress, Dido, in Carthage – today a suburb of the Tunisian capital Tunis – the Phoenicians uncovered graves from 813 BCE inscribed in Hebrew. As well, the oldest Hebrew inscription outside Israel was found in Volubilis, today Oualili, Morocco. Very little is known about those first Jewish settlements in North Africa, except that they always kept in close contact with Palestine, which they referred to as the Holy Land. From the Babylonian Talmud (Rosh Hashanah 26a), we learn that Rabbi Akiva often travelled to North Africa, where he heard words and sounds that enabled him to explain many expressions and terms of the Bible, and from the Jerusalem Talmud (16: 1), we learn that many famous rabbis – Abba, Hanan and Isaac – were born in Carthage.

In 146 BCE, the Romans conquered Carthage and, under the Pax Romana (146-430 BCE), Jewish communities flourished everywhere from India to the edges of Africa. This is why, when Christianity started spreading in North Africa, it encountered stiff resistance from the numerous, strong Berber Jewish communities that were scattered almost without interruption on either side of Carthage, to the east all the way to Cyrenaica and Egypt, and to the west all the way to the Atlantic Ocean. They were strengthened at some point by the 30,000 Jews that Titus deported to North Africa following the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 BCE.

The Romans were sometimes tolerant of the native Jews and Berbers, but at other times, especially after 325 BCE, when Constantine declared Christianity the state religion of his empire, they enforced a repressive and discriminating policy against them. With the Vandal conquest in 430, the Jews were again free and able to prosper until 533, when Justinian, the Byzantine Emperor, invaded the region. His first measure was to reinstate Christianity as the state religion and to order the transformation of all synagogues into churches. For the first time in history, the Jews were confined to areas reserved for them. These were the first Jewish ghettoes. And it was in the city of Borion, under Justinian, that the first forced conversion of Jews took place.

Later on, following severe persecutions in Visigothic Spain, a great number of Jews fled to North Africa, where they contributed significantly to the growth in numbers and observance of its Jewish communities, which became so numerous in some cities that they became the majority of the population. In 698, when the Arabs conquered North Africa (known as the Maghreb), the city of Bizerte in Tunisia, was administered by a Jew. The last episode of that conquest involved the compelling story of a Jewish Berber queen, the kahena, from the Aures Mountains in Algeria, who was known as the most extraordinary woman of all time.

Shortly thereafter, Jews became and remained, for the next 13 centuries, second-class citizens – dhimmis – politically, legally and juridically inferior and subordinate not only to the Muslim rulers, but to the Muslim masses as well. Their life was strictly regulated by the Covenant of Omar, the second caliph, who ruled from 717 to 720. Some rulers were kind and protective of their Jewish minorities. Others, such as the Almohads, were relentless in their persecutions of the Jews, which depleted the Maghrebi communities to the point where most of them ceased to exist because of forced conversions or massacres.

> 'Very little has been done by world Jewish organizations'

Those who were able to flee went to Spain, Italy, Sicily or Egypt, but most went to Palestine, especially Jerusalem and Safed, often walking there. As a result, some Maghrebi family names were found in these two cities for centuries after the Almohad persecutions.

In the 13th century, the Maghrebi Jews slowly recovered despite the many restrictions and indignities of their daily life: heavy collective taxes, forced labour, demeaning jobs. However, there were those who assumed important places in commerce and who were sent to foreign countries as ambassadors. Others became treasurers or viziers to various kings up to the modern period.

The 14th century was a period of relative calm. But the Jews remained so vulnerable, especially in Morocco that in 1428, the ruler deemed it safer for them to be concentrated in their own district: the mellah, situated near the government administrative centre. Although this decision was well-intended, the Jews felt they were being exiled in their own country. They also thought the mellah made them even more vulnerable than when they were dispersed all over the city. They were proven right, as similar mellahs were founded all over Morocco that were designed to humiliate and isolate rather than to protect them. The Arab writer Abd al-Basit describes a totally defenceless community: "In that year [869 in the Muslim calendar corresponds to 1464], a report reached Tlemcen from Fez that a large crowd of Fezzis had attacked the Jews and killed all the men, women and children, killing as many of them as Allah wanted them to kill. This was a glorious day in Fez and a great slaughter… Thereafter, the people of the cities distant from Fez learned of these events. They rose against their Jews and did to them what the people of Fez had done to their Jews… As many as Allah – blessed be he – decreed were killed."

Jewish history in Algeria marked by bloodshed

However, almost 30 years later, these communities were partly reconstituted by a wave of refugees escaping from the Inquisition of 1492 in Spain, and 1497 in Portugal. In the 16th century, most of the Middle East and the Maghreb, except for Morocco, fell into Turkish hands. Given the length and breadth of the Ottoman Empire, it is remarkable that the Turks left no significant trace of their North African conquest on either the Jews or the Muslims.

Algeria

In Algeria, in 1512, Spain invaded Oran and Bougie and sold a great number of Jews into slavery. Partly thanks to the tireless efforts of the prominent Jewish families Ben Aaron, Cansino and Sasportas, the Spaniards began to soften their anti-Jewish policies in Algeria. However, in 1516, they attacked and persecuted the very old Jewish community on the Tunisian island of Jerba. Four years later, Algeria was conquered by the famous Turkish corsair Khayr al-Dyn (1473-1546), better known as Barbarossa (Red Beard) and his pirates. During this period, piracy had become the scourge of Christendom.

We only have a few details about the Algerian Jews and their way of life during the Algerian "golden age" (the 16th and 17th centuries). Those details come mostly from the writings of European officials, missionaries or travellers who fell prisoner to the Algerian corsairs. The priest Diego de Haedo, for example, wrote around 1580 that the Jews had a monopoly on metalwork and that every year they had to pay 600 gold coins – an enormous sum – to the ruler. In addition, whenever there were complaints about or from them, they were fined very heavily. They shared among themselves the burden of the yearly taxes and "gifts" they had to offer the ruler.

In the 18th century, many Jewish merchants expanded their trade to France, but their duties were rarely restricted to trade since many of these merchants acted as diplomats as well. Two prominent Algerian Jewish families, the Busnachs and the Bacris, conducted practically all of the Algerian trade with France while the Cohen family of Algiers controlled the Tunisian-Netherlands trade. The fact that some Jews were very prominent did not protect the community. In 1801, a caid (chief) granted some soldiers the right to pillage and massacre the Jews over a period of three days in return for the soldiers' help in overthrowing the dey (ruler) of Algiers. Similarly, in 1802, the dey placated a threatened revolt of the Janissaries (soldiers in the elite Turkish guard), by offering them Jewish lives and property. The Janissaries agreed and pillaged the Jewish quarter instead of carrying out their revolt, killing several thousand Jews in a few hours.

Suffered persecutions and pogroms

Prominent and highly respected Jews also suffered arbitrary executions. In 1805, Naphtali Busnach, a wealthy merchant, was killed in Algiers by a Janissary. The dey forgave the killer and a few days later, a band of Janissaries, encouraged by this leniency, randomly attacked the city's Jews. These attacks, in turn, triggered a series of pogroms and killings of well-known Jews all over the country. In 1811, David Duran, the muqaddam (treasurer) of the Jewish community was put to death without warning. Two years later, the dey of Algiers defeated the dey of Oran in a battle and then butchered his Jewish mistress and her five sons. In 1815, the dey similarly condemned to death Isaac Aboulker, the chief rabbi of Algiers, along with six Jewish officials.

Not surprisingly, these arbitrary killings and frequent pogroms caused the city's Jews to feel increasingly insecure. In 1828, shortly before the French invasion, Algiers' American consul sent a report in which he described the lives of Algerian Jews as "nothing but a fearful mixture of debasement, oppression, and outrage." Living under constant threats and in daily fear for their lives, the country's Jewish community welcomed, secretly, if not openly, the French army of Maréchal de Bourmont that entered Algiers on July 5, 1830.

French officials became the protectors of the Jewish traders

Tunisia

In Tunisia, the Jewish Turkish corsair, Sinan Pasha, defeated the Spanish army, crushed the Hafsid rulers, and made the country a Turkish pashalik (province) in 1574. Describing the effects of the Ottoman rule in Tunisia almost 100 years later, in 1665, d'Arvieux, the French consul in Algiers wrote: "It is difficult to imagine the contempt, humiliation, and cruelties to which the Jews are subject."

Some Jews who were quite active in international trade qualified for French protection under a special trade agreement between France and the Ottoman Empire that gave France the right to protect European ships and traders. French officials, therefore, came to regard themselves as the protectors of the Jewish traders and, by the early 19th century, 36 Jewish families enjoyed the official support of the French government. When France invaded Algeria in 1830, the Tunisian Jews were relieved. Aware of these feelings, the Tunisian governor liberalized certain restrictive measures against Jews and the precarious situation of the Tunisian Jews seemed to be improving.

But the Muslim masses, anticipating that they would have to make up for the taxes from which the Jews had just been exempted, looted the harahs (Jewish quarters) and killed thousands of Jews. In a famous case in 1857, Batto Sfez was accused – apparently unjustly – of insulting Islam. He was put to death despite the intercessions of the French and other foreign consuls in Tunis, the Tunisian princesses, and a very high ransom offer from the Jewish community. Similar results were seen 11 years later, when 18 Jews were killed in Tunis, but, despite the intervention of the European consuls, no one was arrested or punished for the crimes. But in 1877, a committee of the Alliance Israélite Universelle (AIU), a society founded in Paris in 1860 for the protection of Jews, was strengthened in order to give it the power to intervene in cases of the persecution of Jews.

There was other good news as well. In 1879, in an unprecedented and most generous gesture that touched the Jews enormously, Bey Mohamed as-Sadok granted the Jewish community of Tunis 1,000 square metres of land to build a synagogue. In May 1881, France signed the Treaty of Bardo, making Tunisia a French protectorate.

Morocco

A Spaniard named Marmol described the Jews' lives in Morocco in the early 17th century: "The Jews were utterly degraded. Muslims spat in their faces in the street… At the same time, they were so well educated and intelligent that the king and the aristocracy entrusted them with the management of their affairs."

Moulay Ismail was viciously cruel to Christians and rather indifferent to Jews. He turned a blind eye as they suffered pogrom after pogrom. The situation grew increasingly worse for the Jews despite the fact that some individuals from prominent families, such as Pliaji and de Paz, rose to the high official positions of consul, ambassador and vizier to the king.

'In Algeria, Jews were killed, their cemeteries and synagogues were desecrated'

Moulay Mohamed ben-Abdallah acceded to the Sherifian throne in 1757 and the strong economy he built, primarily with money collected from the Jews and Christians, led to a period of peace and trust. In the course of his rule, he hired Jewish diplomats and interpreters to communicate with the ambassador of the French king, Louis XV, and did the same to negotiate with other European countries.

But when his son Moulay Yazid succeeded him, he made a list of all the Jews who had been influential in his father's court and ordered them hanged by their feet at the gates of Meknes. Many of his Muslim subjects were infuriated by such a drastic change in policy and offered the Jews shelter and protection. Moulay Yazid responded to this challenge by adding "bad Muslims" to his black list, but died fighting near Marrakesh before his orders could be carried out.

During the 30-year rule of Moulay Suleiman, the Jewish minority was free from persecution, and during a typhus epidemic in 1799, he ordered the doctors to take as good care of the Jews as they did of the Muslims.

In 1822, Moulay Abd al-Rahman acceded to the Sherifian throne, which he kept until 1859. His rule was marked by the martyrdom of 16-year-old Sol ha-Tsadica in 1834, who chose to die rather than convert to Islam, but it was also marked by the rise of many Jews to become diplomats and great traders. The sultan sent Abraham Corcos, and the Abensour, Aflalo, Alturas and Benchimol brothers to represent him in various European countries, while Juda Benoliel was appointed Moroccan consul to British Gibraltar and Mayer Ouaknine was appointed ambassador to London.

In 1844, the French attacked Mogador and Tangiers, which triggered pogroms against the Jewish community and the flight of many Jews to Gibraltar. Pogroms, executions and the need to flee from city to city led many Jews to choose to emigrate to Palestine. To stop this exodus, the sultan imposed an exorbitant tax, a so-called exit tax that few in the Jewish community could afford to pay. Nevertheless, there was a wave – the first – of Moroccan immigrants to Hebron, Jerusalem, Safed and Tiberias. Those who were unable to fulfil their dream of settling in Palestine immigrated to Algeria, where they felt protected by the presence of the French colonizers.

In the 19th century, the Anglo-Jewish Association and the AIU tried to intercede on behalf of the Jews. France and Morocco signed a Treaty of Protection in 1863. But as more and more Jews came to enjoy the protection of the French government, in an attempt to stem the tide, King Hassan (1873-1894) promised to grant non-Muslim citizens impartial justice, equality and freedom to worship. When 14-year-old Abd al-Aziz succeeded King Hassan in 1894, his authoritarian and very strict vizier, Ba Ahmed, who was really in control of the kingdom, offered further respite to the Jews. But Ba Ahmed died in 1900, and the country disintegrated into anarchy that was worsened by an epidemic that killed thousands of people including 3,000 Jews in the mellah of Fez before spreading to other cities with a high concentration of Jews.

In the meantime, France was encouraged by its annexation of Algeria in 1830 and Tunisia in 1881, and was waiting for an appropriate time to invade Morocco. De Foucauld, a young French viscount and priest, travelled through Morocco in 1883 and 1884 disguised as a rabbi to give his government a firsthand report about the general situation of the Jews living there. He described a poverty-stricken community: "Every Jew… belongs body and soul to his seigneur, the sid… Nothing in the world protects the Jew against his seigneur: he is entirely at his mercy."

When the Muslims murdered a French doctor in Marrakesh and some European workers in Casablanca in 1907, France immediately sent its navy and occupied northwest Morocco. Five years later, the country was divided into three internationally recognized zones: the French zone, the Spanish zone containing the coastal cities of Ceuta and Melilla, and the international zone of Tangiers. A few days later, angered by the Jews' joyous welcome of the French, the Muslims attacked the mellah of Fez, killing more than 100 members of the Jewish community, raping women and setting the whole mellah on fire.

French colonization

The French colonization of Algeria (1830-1962), Tunisia (1881-1956) and Morocco (1912-1956) had drastic consequences for the Jewish communities in these countries: modernization was undertaken with a monist approach. The Jews were granted freedom and, in some cases, French citizenship, but at a price: they had to adopt all aspects of French culture, including a strong tendency toward secularism. This was the case in France where, during the revolution in 1789, synagogues and churches became temples de la raison (temples of reason) as well as, later on, in France's colonies.

In Algeria, in 1870, thanks to the efforts of the French minister of justice, Isaac Moise Cremieux, a Sephardi Jew, the Jews were granted French nationality. This marked the beginning of a new phenomenon: European Christian anti-Semitism. In France, there was a strong opposition to the Cremieux Decree. In the 1890s, the Dreyfus Affair was blown out of proportion in the French circles of Algeria which, subsequently, also fed on the violently anti-Semitic propaganda of Nazi Germany. Jews were killed, their cemeteries and synagogues were desecrated and burnt, and new discriminatory measures and press campaigns became increasingly frequent.

Despite this hostility, thousands of Algerian Jews joined the French army under Napoleon III in 1870. During World War I, they fought so well that 1,000 were mentioned in special dispatches, 113 were awarded military medals, 850 were decorated with the Croix de Guerre, 39 with the Croix de la Légion d'Honneur and 1,353 died in battle.

'Many Algerian Jews joined the Resistance in France'

During World War II, when France surrendered to Adolf Hitler and marshal Henri-Philippe Pétain took control of the Vichy government, one of his first decisions was to abrogate the Cremieux Decree. Jews were expelled from schools, restricted to a strict numerus clausus in colleges and universities, fired from certain jobs and, in general, made pariahs in their own country. Many Algerian Jews joined the Resistance in France and a small group, the Geo Gras, made up of about 400 fearless and daring young Jewish men, organized the Resistance in Algiers. These men actually made it possible for the Allies to land in the capital during a practically unknown heroic and dangerous operation.

In Tunisia, despite many requests, the Jews were not granted French citizenship by the French authorities. In contrast, between 1891 and 1910, the government granted citizenship to 97 Muslims. But, during World War I, close to 1,000 Jews fought beside the French, who saw in this spontaneous gesture proof of the Jews' loyalty to France and its ideals. Then, in 1917, the harahs of Bizerte, Tunis, Sousse, Sfax, Kairouan and Mahdia were attacked by Muslim mobs, who killed thousands of inhabitants and destroyed their property. These events pushed the French to pass a law in 1923, which granted French nationality to 6,639 Jews between 1926 and 1938.

When the Germans landed in Tunisia on Nov. 23, 1942, they immediately arrested all the leading personalities of the Jewish community, and Colonel Rauff demanded from the chief rabbi Isaac Bellaiche and the president of the community Moise Borgel that 5,000 Jews be sent to the Germans for forced labour. Neither the French nor the Tunisians intervened, and the Jews had to organize a recruiting committee, which had the task of sending thousands of young, strong Jewish men to the dozen labour camps set up all over Tunisia. Many died of hardship; others were killed by the Germans while at work or deported to European concentration camps. Not content to obey German orders, some French officials went beyond the call of duty in denouncing Jews, even co-operating fully with the Germans in the implementation of their Jewish policy.

> 'Many died of hardship'

In Morocco, during the Vichy regime, the rise of Arab-Muslim nationalism and German anti-Semitic propaganda caused some leaders to demand the reinstatement of the Covenant of Omar and the dhimmi status for the Jews. In Casablanca and Marrakesh, the Jews were forced back to their mellahs. They were excluded from their country's economy as the Muslims gradually reduced their business and commercial ties with them. The Moroccan king protected his Jews, but the Vichy restrictions nevertheless imposed severe limitations on their schooling and professions. They were excluded from public office, their land was expropriated and they were financially exploited. General Charles de Gaulle put an end to these discriminatory measures when he overthrew the Vichy regime in June 1943.

The French influence

The consequences of colonization, ironically, were fatal to the Jews' identity. Modernization and emancipation ended their economic indispensability: as secular and higher education opened all job opportunities to them, they no longer monopolized certain industries as they had done for centuries. The community structure was drastically changed in Algeria, though much less so in Tunisia and Morocco, where the Jews were still subjects of the Muslim ruler. Education was, no doubt, the domain in which the changes were most drastic and the consequences most significant. French secular education was instrumental in bringing the Maghrebi Jewish communities from the Middle Ages to the 20th century in a surprisingly short time. The AIU educated and emancipated Jewish children, but in its schools, French studies were treated as a priority. Most parents and educators believed, through the AIU, that mastery of the French language brought social status and prestige. As a result, in Algeria for example, out of a population of about 150,000 Jews in the late 1950s, there were close to 4,000 Jewish students in French universities, or 2.66 per cent of the population, while the French proportion was one per cent and the American, considered the highest in the world: 1.8 per cent.

Synagogue was the pillar

However, the goal of the AIU was mostly to modernize and westernize, and they often did so with a patronizing and sometimes contemptuous attitude toward local cultures. The teachers, many of whom were anti-Zionist, sometimes and in some countries totally neglected Hebrew and Jewish education. Theodor Herzl despised the AIU and its "hollow, pompous name," which, he felt, encouraged anti-Semites to believe that there was indeed an international Jewish conspiracy to dominate the world. He believed that, in the interest of Zionism and of Jews in general, it would be best if the AIU ceased to exist.

Before the French conquest, religion was a daily way of life for North African Jews. The synagogue was the pillar of the community, not only a religious and spiritual venue, but a social, cultural, commercial and intellectual one as well. Many people kept their books in the synagogue, which was always lit up so that those who wished to study could do so anytime. Following their emancipation, the Jews rushed out of their mellahs and harahs to live in the European quarters. They conformed as much as possible to their new environment, spoke French, dressed à la française, deserted the synagogue except for a few major holidays, and were obliged to go to school on Saturday.

Gradually, most of their institutions were abolished or weakened by the French administration until they became altogether unused. It seems as though, once the external barriers of segregation were removed, the internal ones, ill-equipped to withstand the shock, collapsed. These changes caused the Jews to become estranged from their native land, although they were not legally marginal any longer since France had decreed that all citizens of its overseas possessions were equal, without distinction of creed or colour. The Jews were caught between a fascinating attraction to the modern world of material and intellectual rationalism and a certain nostalgia for the deeply religious, spiritual and mystic world of traditional Judaism. But the vast majority, especially in Algeria, dropped the latter.

The exodus

During the seven years of the war of independence of Algeria, most Jews were neutral. There were, however, those who sided with the French and others with the Arabs, sometimes within the same family. This is how, in 1960 Algiers, William Levy was killed by the French Organisation de l'Armée Secrete and his son was killed by the Algerian Fédération de Libération Nationale.

In 1961, de Gaulle publicly admitted for the first time that French Algeria might not remain French for much longer, and the Muslims started harassing the Jews. They burned a synagogue in Algiers, desecrated a cemetery in Oran, and killed a few leading personalities. Realizing that they would be better off with the French than with the Arabs, and following the expression "la valise ou le cercueil" (the suitcase or the coffin), the Jews chose the suitcase. They left en masse, abandoning everything. A few went to Israel, Canada or the United States, but most chose France. There are no Jews living in Algeria today.

In Tunisia, one of the most remarkable personalities of the intellectual elite was Habib Bourguiba. He succeeded in convincing the French prime minister Pierre Mendes-France, a Sephardi Jew, to officially grant to Tunisia its right to internal autonomy. This was followed on March 20, 1956, by Tunisia's independence. Five days later, the country's Jews lived through a memorable experience: for the first time, they voted as full-fledged citizens for the representatives of the first Tunisian Constitutional Assembly.

A few weeks later, Habib Bourguiba was nominated president for life. Bourguiba, in turn, chose a Jew, André Barouch, who had fought by his side for the independence of their country, as minister of planning and reconstruction. The following year, Barouch was replaced by a Muslim and there have been no Jews in the Tunisian government ever since.

Contrary to what happened in Algeria and Morocco, the struggle for independence in Tunisia did not lead to much violence against the Jews. However, many were expelled and, in 1958, the harah of Tunis was torn down, including an ancient synagogue that was a historical landmark. The Jewish cemetery was made into a park, Jews' commercial licences were rarely renewed and life was generally made more difficult for the Jews. Most Jews left everything and went to Israel, while others chose France, Canada or the United States. Today, there are only a few thousand Jews still living in Tunisia, mostly in its capital, Tunis, and the island of Jerba.

In 1957, restrictive emigration laws passed against Jews

Another prominent Jewish minister was appointed in Morocco, after it gained its independence in 1956. King Mohamed chose a Dr. Benzaquen who had, in many ways contributed greatly to the independence of his country, as minister of posts. But prime minister Si Embarek Bekkai was considered far too moderate, and was soon replaced by leftist Abdallah Ibrahim, who gave Benzaquen's portfolio to a Muslim whose first decision was to sever postal relations with Israel.

In 1957, a law forbade the minister of the interior to grant passports to Jews, who could no longer leave the country legally. Those who were caught trying to leave were imprisoned and tortured. But instead of discouraging the Jews, this impelled them to try anything to leave. The collective hysteria culminated in January 1961 with the tragedy of the Pisces, a small fishing boat that sank with 43 Jews on board. Soon thereafter, Mohamed V died and his son Hassan II took power. One of Hassan's first decisions was to allow the Jews to leave, which they did en masse, most of them for Israel, and the others for France and North America.

In Spanish Morocco, the situation was different. Spanish colonization was mostly economic and hardly cultural. Therefore, it seems that, apart from the adoption of the Spanish language and the Hakitie dialect, Jews' lives were not significantly changed. There are a few thousand Jews left in Morocco.

Accomplishments

Throughout the centuries, these communities had a vibrant religious, intellectual and cultural life. In 669, Oqba ben Nafi founded the city of Kairouan in Tunisia, where he encouraged Jews and Copts to settle. Many Jews from the Machrek (Middle East), especially Iraq, heeded his call and formed the nucleus of a prosperous and intellectually vibrant community, which was in close contact with the academies of Sura and Pumbedita in Iraq and Jerusalem in Palestine. The Aghlabids made their capital in Kairouan, which became the third Holy City of Islam and from which all non-Muslims were expelled.

> 'Throughout the centuries, a vibrant religious life'

Kairouan was so well known that the famous traveller Eldad Hadani visited there. Mar Oqba, the Babylonian Exilarch (the leader of the Jewish community), settled there, and Isaac Israeli, a doctor at the Fatimid court, founded the first medical school of the Maghreb there. In the early 11th century, Emir Badis chose Rabbi Abraham ben Nathan ben Ata to be his own private doctor and subsequently his son's private doctor as well as the nagid (leader) of the Jewish community. Kairouan was the most important centre of talmudic studies, followed by Fez. It was destroyed in 1057 by the Bedouin tribe of the Banu Hillal and, three years later, by Berber tribes. That spelled the end of Jewish life in the city.

Al-Fassi, who was born in Algeria in 1013, had studied in Kairouan with Nissim ben Jacob and Hananel ben Hushiel. He transferred the intellectual and spiritual centre of Maghrebi Judaism from Kairouan to Fez, where the Rambam settled in 1159, and where Rabbi Youssef ben Aknin, born in Ceuta, wrote philosophical and theological works. Yehuda ibn Kourash of Tahert (Morocco), was the first philologist to elaborate a system of compared linguistics. Dounash ben Tamim, a student of Isaac Israeli, was a brilliant linguist and doctor. The famous linguist, Dounash ben Labrat, was the first to use the Arabic meter in Hebrew poetry, and Yehouda ben David Hayouj, one of his disciples, worked on the foundations of Hebrew grammar until his death in 1010.

Isaac ben Khalfoun, born in Morocco in 1020, was the first poet to make a living from his literary gifts. Rabbi Shlomo ben Yehouda of Fez was appointed gaon of the Jerusalem Academy and Nissim ben Jacob inaugurated a literary genre in which he excelled: popular tale around social topics.

In the 12th century, Yehuda ben Samuel ibn Abbas al-Maghribi wrote exquisite poems, some of them which are included in the liturgy of the High Holy Days. In the 14th century, the study of Kabbalah and Jewish philosophy was much advanced under the guidance of a number of prominent Jewish thinkers, including the famous philosopher Nissim ibn Malka and his son Judah ben Malka, whose philosophical treatises are studied to this day. In Algeria, Rabbi Ephraim Ankawa strengthened the Tlemcen community, and rabbis Isaac ben Chechet Barfat (Ribach), and Shimon ben Tsemach Duran (Rachbatz) made Algiers into a famous religious and intellectual centre.

The Jews of Syria

By JUDY FELD CARR

"And the ransomed of God shall return,
And come with shouting to Zion,
Crowned with joy everlasting."

So begins the book on the secret rescue of the Syrian Jewish Community, The Ransomed of God, by University of Toronto historian Harold Troper.

Jewish tradition has held throughout its long and difficult history that it is a mitzvah, a holy act, to ransom captives held as hostages. This mitzvah is known as pidyon shvuyim.

In the latter part of the 20th century up until 2001, a few thousand members of the Jewish communities of Damascus, Aleppo and Qamishli were held for ransom individually. Most of the ransom money was donated by members of the Canadian Jewish community to the Dr. Ronald Feld Fund of the Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

There are now 38 Jews left in Syria.

Syrian Jews trace their ancestry back to the time of King David, long before the arrival of the Muslims. According to legend, the Great Synagogue of Aleppo was constructed by King David's general, Joab ben Seruya, after his conquest of the city. To this day, the remains of the synagogue, which was destroyed in 1947, are referred to as Joab's Synagogue.

In 1552, Rabbi Moses Bassala d'Ancona referred to the Jawbar Synagogue outside of Damascus as a "handsome synagogue, the like of which I have never seen. There is a beautiful cave above the synagogue in which, it is said, Elijah the prophet – may his memory be blessed – hid. It is indeed an awesome place." Syrian Jews used to bow upon entering one of their magnificent structures.

During the Spanish Inquisition in the 15th century, the Jewish refugees made their way to Damascus and Aleppo in large numbers. There they established their own synagogues, schools and cemeteries, and with the arrival of a small wave of Italian Sephardim, they worked primarily in trade, commerce, the making of jewelry and other crafts.

The communities were firmly ruled by the beit din, the religious court, supported by the committees of community leaders. Relations with the Muslims were sometimes amicable, but formal. As in the rest of the Arab world, Jews and Christians, as believers in one God, had the status of dhimmi, which was a misnomer because they weren't protected but treated as second-class citizens.

Because Jews would not accept Islam, they were subjected to humiliating measures. A special tax was imposed (jizya), restrictions were placed on the height of their synagogues, they were limited in the choice of animals they could ride, they were required to wear distinctive dress and to step aside for Muslim passersby, and they were prohibited from walking in the rain, lest it should splash from them onto a Muslim.

Maghrebi Jews are home in Israel

Toward the end of the 16th century, the Jewish community in Morocco became markedly more vibrant intellectually and more prone to an interest in mysticism than the Jews in Tunisia or Algeria. This was evident during the time of the false messiah Shabbetai Zvi, for whom they showed far more enthusiasm and fervour than the Tunisians or the Algerians. It took the moral and intellectual authority of famous rabbis such as Jacob Sasportas, Aaron Siboni and Daniel Toledano to reason with them. Other famous rabbis, writers and thinkers, all visibly influenced by the Rambam, were Abensur, Berdugo, Delonga, Toledano and Uziel. The study of the Zohar was very common in the rabbinical milieux of Marrakesh, Safi and Sale, with teachers such as Abraham Azoulay, Iossef Corcos, Moshe Elbaz, Iossef Gikatilla (author of Guinat Egoz) and Shimon Lavi from Tripoli. David ben Hassine (1727-1792), an outstanding poet, was born in Meknes.

This cultural and spiritual activity in Morocco was in stark contrast to the activity in Tunisia where, despite the inauguration in 1768 of a Hebrew printing press and the tireless efforts of Rabbi Abraham Taieb, the community had become so apathetic that Rabbi Haim Iossef David Azoulay (the HIDA) of the yeshiva of Hebron decided to go to Tunis to get the Jews re-interested in spiritual and religious matters.

In the 19th century, numerous rabbis such as rabbis Mas'oud Knafo, Abraham Coriat, Isaac Benwalid and Mordekhai Bengio in Morocco, and Ouziel Alhayk, Mordekhai Carvalho, Hai Taieb, Joshua Bessis and Salomon Dana in Tunisia, wrote poetry and rabbinic and kabbalistic treatises. As for Algeria, most Jews by then were living more in French than in any other language.

The exodus of the Jews from their age-old North African native land fortunately did not dry up their creativity. In France, they injected badly needed new blood to a practically moribund Jewish community and succeeded so well that French Jewry today is essentially Sephardi. (Today's community in France is the second largest Sephardi community after Israel.) They are in all spheres of French life: they built new Jewish schools and yeshivot; the chief rabbi of France, subsequently appointed rabbi of the European Union, is Joseph Sitruk, a native of Tunisia; they are mayors of cities, members of the French Assemblée Nationale; they dominate many sectors of the entertainment business; and they contribute greatly to the literary scene, through authors such as Ami Bouganim, Paula Darmon, Edmond El Maleh from Morocco, Albert Bensoussan, Jean Daniel and Maurice Partouche from Algeria, and Albert Memmi, Annie Goldmann and Guy Sitbon from Tunisia.

In Israel, after a difficult and painful early period, many North African Jews are now contributing to all domains of society and public life. Thanks to these men and women, the Maghrebi Jews seem to feel they have finally come home after close to 3,000 restless years of wandering.

'Blood libel has again been revived in Damascus'

Until the 19th century, there were no uprisings against, or massacres of, Jews in Aleppo, but in 1840 in Damascus, the first serious blood libel erupted in the Arab world. The affair began with the disappearance of an Italian Capuchin friar and his servant. The local Christians and the French consul accused the Jews of having murdered the men to obtain their blood to bake matzot for the Passover holiday. A Jewish barber was arrested and confessed under torture, implicating members of the community. Two of those people died under torture. One saved himself by converting to Islam. Two "confessed." Sixty-three Jewish children were taken hostage to force their parents to reveal where the "martyrs'" blood was hidden.

> 'Conditions worsened after 1964'

Sir Moses Montifiore led a delegation of French Jews to Syria to intercede on behalf of the accused. After several weeks of incarceration, the prisoners were freed. But the incident was not forgotten. In 1964, Prof. Abd al-Karim Gharayiba of the University of Damascus warned mothers against letting their children out at night "lest the Jews… come and take their blood to bake matzot at Passover."

Today, the blood libel has again been revived in Damascus in what has become a best-selling book in the Arab world. The Matzah of Zion, written by Syria's defence minister G. Mustafa Tlass in 1983, used the fallacy of ritual murder to stir up anti-Semitism by charging that the Jewish religion is characterized by the "destructive evils" of its beliefs and by its "hatred to all humanity and all religions."

Tlass continues to defend the theory. He has recently been quoted on Lebanese television as saying, "We live in a tradition of martyrdom. When I see a Jew before me, I kill him. If every Arab did this all over the world, it would be the end of the Jews."

The Syrian Jewish community, which numbered 40,000 in the early 1900s, had dwindled to 15,000 by 1948. At that time, Syrian Jews faced terrible dangers. As soon as the United Nations declared the partition of Palestine, Arabs attacked several synagogues, stores and Jewish homes. The rampage continued into 1949 when 12 Jews were killed by a bomb thrown into a synagogue in Damascus, followed by an arson attack on the Jewish school in Aleppo. Aleppo's Great Synagogue was also torched.

Another casualty of the rampage was the famous Aleppo Codex, called in Hebrew Keter Aram Zobah (keter means crown). The earliest-known manuscript of the full text of the Jewish Bible, or the Tanach – composed of the Pentateuch, the Prophets and the Writings – had been made famous by Maimonides and became accepted universally as the order of the Bible. The codex, which had been moved from Israel to Egypt and then to Syria at the end of the 14th century, had been kept in a vault for more than 600 years. Only about two-thirds of this authoritative text was rescued from the fire and smuggled out of the country to Israel and the Ben Tzvi Institute. Scraps of the pages, blowing in the wind from the fire, were seized upon by members of the community and many men wore a piece in a locket around their necks, as a talisman.

Security officials frequently arrested Jews on dubious charges and imprisoned them in the notorious El-Maze prison. A new branch of the secret police (the notorious Mukhabarat), under the instruction of the escaped Nazi Alois Brunner (also known as George Fischer), the second in command to Adolf Eichmann, was instructed to watch the movements of every Jew. A new law was initiated to end their communications abroad.

Conditions worsened after the Ba'ath party seized control in 1964. Internal travel was restricted to three miles from the homes. Jews could not be employed in any government office. There were strict curfews, lasting for several weeks at a time. Jewish businessmen were required to take Muslim partners. Emigration was prohibited. The few privileged Jews allowed out of the country for medical treatment or business were obliged to leave family members behind, as sureties for their return to the country, together with large sums of money. Neither private nor public property could be sold (and to this day remain expropriated without compensation by the Syrian government). Mail and telephone calls were censored or monitored. Jewish schools were placed under the directorship of Muslim principals and Arab students were obliged to enrol. There was a strict Jewish quota for institutions of higher learning. Palestinian "refugees" were billeted in the Jewish ghettoes in houses next to members of the Jewish community. The word Mousawi (Jew) was written across all Jewish identity cards (and for the lucky ones, on passports), first in red and later in black ink.

In 1972, a lifeline to Syria's Jews was started in Toronto

Somewhat of a turning point came in March 1974. That month, four teenage girls – the Sebbagh sisters and their cousin Eva Saad – were raped and murdered trying to escape across the border into Lebanon. For the first time in their history, several hundred Damascus Jews held a protest march. The police dispersed the crowd with water cannons.

In December 1983, a pregnant Jewish woman, Lillian Abadi, and her two children were hacked to pieces with an axe in their own home. No person was ever arrested or charged with the murders, but then no person in Syria has ever been charged with the crime of murdering a Jew.

> More than 3,000 Jews were rescued

Jews who were caught trying to escape and their families were imprisoned, either in solitary confinement or in foul communal cells, without charges and without a trial. They were kept incommunicado and tortured.

The regime of Hafez al-Assad was among the most brutal on earth. Even Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch issued reports accusing Assad of a litany of horrors, including the imprisonment of Jews.

Deprivation of sleep, withholding of food, psychological pressure, cigarette burns, kicking, whipping, beatings on every part of the body, especially the feet and genitals, electric shock, extraction of finger and toenails, special torture machines – Amnesty International has listed some 38 forms of torture practised by the Mukhabarat. Human Rights Watch stated in 1900 that "no other community in Syria faces such heavy surveillance and none is made to feel so powerless in the face of the authorities [as the Jews]."

Here was a community crying out for liberation.

In 1972, a lifeline was started in Toronto. Thousands of dollars worth of religious books and articles were sent to rabbis in Damascus, Aleppo and Qamishli at their request, as well as funds for the poor and the families of those imprisoned.

But what began as a relief initiative quickly became a dangerous, covert activity of rescue – the present practice of the ancient mitzvah of pidyon shvuyim. People had to be paid to smuggle goods and officials needed to be bribed for desperately needed exit permits. Just one leak anywhere would have closed every door.

During a period of about 30 years, more than 3,000 members of the beleaguered Jewish community of Damascus were removed, person by person, by a series of clandestine activities. Today, only those who are elderly and who have chosen to stay remain.

However, one treasure of the community – indeed, of the Jewish world – remained: yet another codex, or keter, the existence of which had been speculated upon in the West and in Israel and was thought to have remained in Syria. This exquisite manuscript of the Tanach, the Damascus Keter, was, in fact, located and quietly removed – fully intact – from its 500 year-old resting place in the basement of a synagogue in Syria. It was spirited to Canada and, after being hidden in Toronto, was given to the former chief rabbi of Syria to take with him when he made aliyah.

Written on almost translucent vellum, as clear today as when the scribe penned it in the 12th century, this book found its way from Castille to Constantinople during the Spanish Inquisition and then to Damascus. There, it was read publicly once a year on Shavuot, and then returned to its protected glass case, revered by all who knew of its existence. Having been presented to the president of the State of Israel for all the Jewish people, it now lies in a protected, controlled environment in the National Jewish Library of the Hebrew University, there to be studied and interpreted by scholars.

The Damascus Keter remains a remnant of what was a golden saga in Jewish history that has otherwise dissolved into mere memory.

Judy Feld Carr is a musicologist. For years, she led the struggle for freedom for Syrian Jewry.

L'exode des Juifs d'Irak

NAÏM KATTAN

Personal Testimonies: Iraq

J'ai quitté Bagdad en 1947 grâce à une bourse du gouvernement français et j'ai poursuivi mes études à la Sorbonne, à Paris. Autour de moi, nombreux étaient ceux qui cherchaient, par tous les moyens, de partir. Car, depuis le farhoud, le pogrom qui, en 1941, a frappé les juifs irakiens à la suite de la chute du gouvernement pro-nazi de Rachid Ali al Gaylani, ceux-ci ne se sentaient plus en sécurité d'autant plus que les gouvernements irakiens successifs rendaient leur vie de plus en plus difficile. Cette vie devint intenable après la naissance de l'Etat d'Israël en 1948 et la défaite des armées arabes, dont celle de l'Irak, qui l'ont combattu.

La communauté juive d'Irak a pour origine les prisonniers de Nabuchodonosor à Babylone. Pendant vingt-cinq siècles, elle a survécu au passage de divers empires et royaumes. Mes ancêtres furent là avant les chrétiens et les musulmans. Notre communauté fut fortement intégrée à la vie de l'Irak depuis l'indépendance du pays en 1922. Les juifs participaient fortement à la vie politique, culturelle et économique du pays. Aussi le farhoud fut plus qu'un signal d'alarme. Dès ce moment, les Juifs s'étaient sentis sans défense, abandonnés aux hordes d'assassins et de pilleurs. Ils ne s'étaient jamais guéris de ce traumatisme d'autant plus que les autorités ne cessaient de les harceler, leur rappelant constamment qu'ils étaient suspects et, par conséquent, indésirables.

Un jour, en 1949, à Paris, rentrant chez moi, un étudiant irakien musulman que je connaissais m'exprima ses regrets à ce qui était arrivé à mon frère à Bagdad. Un ami m'envoyait régulièrement les journaux irakiens qui faisaient état des multiples procès qui frappaient les juifs sous l'accusation de sionisme-communisme. Il évita de me faire parvenir celui qui faisait mention de la condamnation de mon frère, sous la même accusation, à deux ans de prison. D'autres juifs étaient accusés d'espionnage et de subversion. Aux commerçants on n'accordait plus de permis d'importation ou d'exportation. Certains payaient des musulmans pour qu'ils leur servent de prêtes noms. On admettait parcimonieusement des étudiants juifs dans les universités et les autorités leur auraient interdit l'entrée aux écoles si la communauté juive ne disposait pas de son propre réseau scolaire.

> Pendant vingt-cinq siècles, la communauté juive d'Irak a survécu au passage de divers empires et royaumes

En 1950, le gouvernement irakien effectua un véritable tournant politique. Au lieu de garder les juifs en leur faisant subir le sort de criminels en puissance, il leur a donné le choix de partir, de quitter le pays en laissant derrière eux tous leurs biens et toutes leurs propriétés. L'immense majorité à pris le chemin du taskit, c'est-à-dire l'annulation de leur nationalité irakienne. Par entente tacite avec le jeune Etat d'Israël, des avions les transportaient à Chypre d'où d'autres avions les emmenaient en Israël. Ceux qui sont restés ont subi discriminations et persécutions et ont fini par prendre le chemin de départ.

Près de cent cinquante mille juifs irakiens, logés à leur arrivée en Israël dans des camps, des maabarot, ont mis des années à se refaire une vie. Il leur fallait apprendre la langue hébraïque même quand ils avaient appris à prier en hébreu et devaient se recycler dans de nouveaux métiers. Le plus difficile pour eux, sans doute, était de retrouver leur dignité et leur confiance. Pour la plupart, la perte fut immense et une génération fut sacrifiée.

Quand Saddam Hussein prit le pouvoir, les juifs qui restaient en Irak étaient peu nombreux et ils ne le préoccupaient point. Aujourd'hui, quand j'aperçois en Israël et ailleurs les enfants de ceux dont les existences furent gâchés je me dis, qu'en dépit des souffrances subies, le départ des juifs d'Irak était ce qui pouvait leur arriver de mieux. Je les vois à Montréal, à Londres, à New York et, bien sûr, en Israël et je répète qu'il faudrait rendre grâce à Dieu qui leur a épargné le sort des autres Irakiens, musulmans ou chrétiens, terrorisés, soumis aux persécutions d'un dictateur sanguinaire dont il n'y eut pas d'exemple dans l'histoire du pays. Quatre millions d'Irakiens, musulmans ou chrétiens, ont choisi l'exil. Ils ont quitté une terre débordant de richesses pour chercher à survivre dans divers pays d'Europe et d'Amérique.

> Près de cent cinquante mille juifs irakiens ont mis des années à se refaire une vie

Après l'entrée des forces américaines en Irak, on a dénombré une trentaine de juifs qui restaient dont deux seulement savaient réciter les prières hébraïques, seuls témoins, seule subsistance d'une communauté qui a donné le Talmud au judaïsme et au monde.

Depuis la chute de Saddam on me demande souvent ce que je souhaiterais voir en Irak si l'occasion se présentait à moi pour la première fois après plus d'un demi-siècle d'absence de visiter mon pays natal. Ma première réaction est de dire que je voudrais pouvoir, à nouveau, traverser le Tigre à la nage en souvenir de mon enfance alors que mon frère aîné me réveillait à cinq heures du matin pour je l'accompagne à la baignade avant le lever du soleil. Nostalgie absurde, quasi-comique, car le Tigre qui était en ce temps là horriblement pollué le serait davantage aujourd'hui.

Sans doute irais-je me promener rue Abou Nouas, au bord du fleuve, dans le quartier Battawiyeen, construit et peuplé dans les années quarante par une classe moyenne juive. Je me promènerais rue Rachid, passerais par Kember Ali et Senak. J'imaginerais la ville grouillante de vie et des Juifs, fonctionnaires ou commerçants, avocats, journalistes ou épiciers, médecins ou joailliers, déambuler dans ces rues, enrichissant la ville de leurs talents et de leur travail.

Je sais que cette ville n'est plus là et il faudrait que je recherche un patrimoine plus ancien. J'irais d'abord à Ur en Chaldée, lieu de naissance d'Abraham, notre ancêtre et celui de tous les monothéistes. Je me rendrais ensuite à Keffel me recueillir devant le tombeau d'Ezechiel, je chercherais ensuite celui d'Ezra hasoffer et puis j'irais à Babylone où, adolescent, j'accompagnais mes camarades de classe de l'école de l'Alliance Israélite Universelle à l'excursion annuelle que nous y faisions. Le site sera là et je saluerais les traces d'une civilisation que mes ancêtres ont connue, ce qui ne les a pas empêchés de poursuivre la leur, fidèle au Livre qu'ils préservaient en le commentant.

Je formulerais alors un vœu. A l'instar de mes ancêtres, les prisonniers qui ont vaincu la servitude en étudiant le Livre, je souhaiterais que ceux, vingt-cinq siècles plus tard, qui furent chassés du pays, connaissent une nouvelle victoire qui serait une vie nouvelle, riche et fructueuse, en Israël, au Canada, en Angleterre et ailleurs.

Naïm Kattan est un écrivain illustre qui a été le récipiendaire de plusieurs prix littéraires. Il demeure à Montréal.

Award-winning Montreal author Naïm Kattan, who was born in Iraq, reflects on the exodus of Iraqi Jews, primarily to Israel, which began with a pogrom in 1941 and ended with the expulsion of some 150,000 Jews in the early 1950s.

Leaving Iraq on a wing and a prayer

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Personal Testimonies: Iraq

Bertha Mayer will never forget the moment the sun set on Baghdad on Sunday, June 1, 1941.

A Nazi-backed revolt against the Jews, now known as the farhud, or the looting, erupted that day. One hundred and seventy-seven people were reportedly killed that night, and Jewish property was stolen and destroyed in the riot that lasted two days.

Mayer's father, Rabbi Yehoshua Mosha, was the av beit din (religious court judge) in Baghdad. "He was well- known in the city because he was also a mohel who performed Jewish and Muslim circumcisions," Mayer told The CJN.

"There was no way to hide our Jewish identity," Mayer said, recalling that first day of Shavuot when Muslim neighbours – friends of her brother – came over to their home, just as the looting began. She was only a child then, but described the event as if it happened yesterday.

"They hugged and covered us and walked us, one by one, to their home where we would be protected," Mayer said. "They even provided us with a dairy meal because they knew we were kosher."

In 1951, Mayer left Iraq – a Jewish community historians estimate as being more than 2,700 years old – on Israeli airlifts known as Operation Ezra and Nechamia, which brought more than 100,000 Iraqi Jews to Israel. She was 15 years old. Her father, Yehoshua, and mother, Tova, came soon after.

Sasson Mayer, Bertha's husband, will also never forget June 1, 1941. He was 14 years old at the time, and down by the river with a friend when he heard gunshots. He immediately ran home where he stayed with his family the rest of the night.

"We lived north of Baghdad and weren't as affected by the looting," Sasson said. A year or two later, Sasson joined the Zionist underground, and began taking direction from Yosef Basri, one of the two Jews hanged in Iraq in 1951 for spying.

Before the farhud, Sasson said, Jewish communal life was vibrant and included Jewish synagogues, day schools, hospitals and health-care centres. His father, Moise, was the headmaster of Shemesh, the only Jewish high school in Baghdad.

"The school had 13 classes of 30 students," Sasson said, noting that many Jewish students went to public schools, Muslim schools and American schools.

Jews were involved in every level of Iraqi society from 1920, when Iraq was placed under British Mandate, until 1932, when Iraq was granted independence by the British, he said.

"The first minister of finance, Yehezkel Sasson, was Jewish," he said.

‘Most Jews rarely assimilated into the Muslim community’

But most Jews rarely assimilated into the Muslim community. Though occasionally a Jewish man took more than one wife, as many Muslims did, the Jewish community generally kept to itself, Sasson said.

Personal Testimonies: Iraq

In 1950, after the government of Iraq lifted the martial law that forbade travel, Sasson attempted to flee to Israel through Iran with Mordechai Ben Porat, who later became an Israeli cabinet minister and author of To Baghdad and Back: The Miraculous 2,000 Year Homecoming of the Iraqi Jews. In September 1950, Mayer was captured in Basra, with Ben Porat and Sasson’s younger brother, Dan.

Sasson sat in jail for 13 days with several other Jewish prisoners, who had already been incarcerated for more than six months. Finally, on the eve of Yom Kippur, a telegram arrived instructing the authorities to release him along with five other Jewish prisoners. Bail was set at 150 British pounds each.

Earlier that year, the Iraqi government issued a new law allowing Jews to leave Iraq on the condition they renounce their nationality. Many Jews began selling their properties slowly at reduced rates, before giving up their citizenship. However, when a series of bombs directed at the Jewish community killed three people, Jews began making aliyah.

> In 1950, many Jews began making aliyah

In May 1951, Sasson left Basra for Baghdad. From there, he flew to Cyprus, and then finally to Israel.

More than 6,000 Jews remained in Iraq, but most of them later made their way to Israel, Sasson said.

Bertha and Sasson met and married in Israel, but did not stay there. In 1968, they moved to Canada with their children, Igal, Sarit and Moshe Mark. The couple lives alone in Toronto.

Arrested and imprisoned in Egypt

Personal Testimonies: Egypt

On May 15, 1948, at 3 o'clock in the morning, barely a day after the United Nations proclaimed the new State of Israel, an Egyptian officer and two soldiers knocked on Tanya and Joseph Pardo's door in downtown Cairo.

"We knew they were coming," Tanya told The CJN. The police had just left her parents-in-law, looking for Joseph's brother, and Tanya's step-mother-in-law had called ahead to warn them.

"I was so scared," Tanya said. Not, she said, because her husband was a Zionist. Because she was.

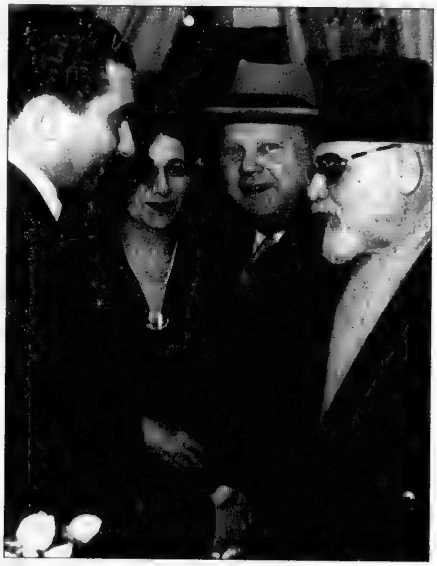
As she lay in bed, she remembered that brochures about Israeli kibbutzim were lying around the apartment. She quickly got up, shredded the pamphlets as best she could, shoved them under her mattress, turned off the lights and waited.

Moments later, the police arrived, began an elaborate search of the Pardo home and even though they never found the brochures, they took Joseph away.

Initially, he was taken to a Jewish community school where he was questioned with 800 other Jewish prisoners, including a few young women and several Communists.

"The conditions were terrible," Tanya said. "They slept on wooden slabs and shared one or two toilets."

After a few days, Joseph was taken to a camp in the desert, 30 kilometres outside of Cairo, where the conditions were somewhat better. They had iron beds and an outdoor cold shower.



Tanya's parents, Ella and Isaac Liscovitch, look on while the chief rabbi of Egypt, Haim Nahoum Effendi, shakes hands with Guido Levi. Guido was later interned at a detention camp in the desert with his brother, Joseph Pardo.

The commander of the camp was a Copt officer who as a Christian identified with being a minority and helped the Jewish prisoners, Tanya said.

She said Palestinians were being trained to fight against Israel in a camp nearby. One Friday, after coming out of the mosque, a mob began an attack against the Jews. Fortunately, the camp commander allowed the Jews to defend themselves and told the attackers that "they'll only get to the Jews over his dead body." Eventually, the commander got Egyptian troops to control the situation.

After two months, Joseph got out of prison

Personal Testimonies:

Other than that, the French consul and the embassy didn't help them at all, Tanya said. They helped secure the release of the non-Jewish prisoners. But not the Jewish ones, she said.

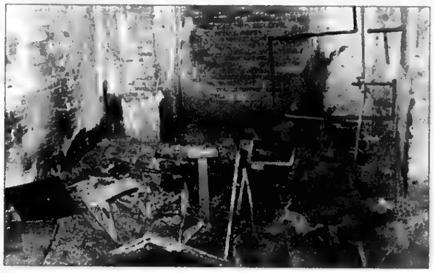
Born in Cairo in 1922, Tanya remembers the Jewish community as being made up of three parts: Ashkenazi; Sephardi and Oriental; and Caraite Jews who believed in the Torah, but not the Talmud.

Of the Jews who carried different nationalities – Austrian, French, British, Italian and Eygptian – those with Egyptian passports had the hardest time leaving when the situation got difficult, Tanya said. She herself carried a French passport, and was educated at the Lycée Française. During World War II, she became involved with the De Gaulle French Forces for Freedom, and brought parcels to the French consulate several times a week.

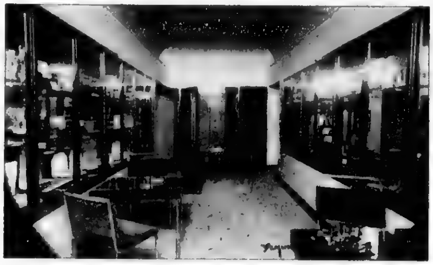
Before the war, Tanya said, relations between the Jews and Muslims were good.

"In the 1928 Olympics, Salvatore Cicurel, a Jew, very well-known in the community, represented Egypt in fencing. In 1938, Jews from Egypt as well as Egyptian Muslims represented Egypt in sports competitions in Greece and Turkey. Aslan Cattaoui Pacha, the president of the Sephardi Jewish community, was a senator, and the palace lawyer was Maître Mizrachi Pacha. Vidon, a Jewish family… made all the uniforms for the Egyptian army."



The Liscovitch Jewellery store the day after the looting.

But all that changed in 1945 with the creation of the Arab League in Cairo, Tanya said.



The Liscovitch Jewellery store before looting in January 1952.

The League, which proclaimed the legality of Palestine, passed a series of resolutions dealing with the boycotting of Zionist products, prohibiting the sale of land to all Zionists and restricting contact with supporters of Israel.

* * *

After two months, using their political connections, Tanya and her family managed to get Joseph out of prison.

"Of course, we also had to pay off three or four people," she said.

Finally, at the end of July, Tanya remembers a truck pulling into the police station with her husband and 12 other prisoners.

Tanya said her husband's experience wasn't as bad as that of those who remained behind. "Some prisoners stayed for a year. And in 1956, many were imprisoned again, beaten and treated very badly," she said.

In August 1949, the Pardos left Egypt, one by one, as they secured exit visas. They made their way first to Switzerland, then to Israel, finally settling in Canada.

One of the first things Tanya did when she arrived in Canada was hire a lawyer to get rid of her French citizenship.

"It wasn't easy. In fact, it was a big, long story… but I didn't want it anymore," she said. —A.M.

Robin Behar's Egypt

Personal Testimonies: Egypt

For many Jews around the world, the exodus from Egypt recalls biblical expressions of freedom and redemption from slavery.

But Robin Behar's departure from the land of the pyramids, which took place in 1956, introduced modern expressions such as confiscation, imprisonment and expulsion into his 10-year-old vocabulary.

Several events led to that departure.

In 1946, the Ashkenazi synagogue in Cairo was burned down and soon rebuilt by the Jewish community.

In 1947, with Israeli statehood on the horizon, the Egyptian government began enacting changes that affected the Jewish community, such as the Companies' Law, under which it became a requirement for 75 per cent of all employees in every company to be Egyptian.

Even though most Jews were born in Egypt and had lived there for generations, more than 80 per cent held foreign passports or were designated as stateless persons. As a result, many companies were forced to fire Jews.

After 1948, Egypt began arresting Jews for their involvement in what were considered to be Zionist activities. Behar's uncle, Joseph Pardo, was imprisoned for belonging to Maccabiah, a Jewish sports club. In August of that year, about 250 Jews were killed or wounded by a series of bombs that went off in Jewish neigbourhoods.

Robin Behar's bar mitzvah at the Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue in Cairo, June 1959.

In 1949, when travel restrictions eased, Jews slowly began to leave.

However, their emigration escalated after Black Saturday. On Jan. 26, 1952, anti-British rioters looted and destroyed major stores in Cairo, many of them Jewish-owned. Behar recalls driving with his parents through the burnt-out downtown streets, wondering why people would behave that way. Many of his close friends and their families packed up and left a country that had been their home for generations, often disappearing in the middle of the night.

Behar's ancestors arrived in Egypt after the Spanish Inquisition in 1492. At that time, he said, Egypt was considered to be a land of opportunity. Gradually, the Jewish community integrated into various aspects of Egyptian life. One of his great-grandfathers lived in a mansion in Alexandria and was the first to import electric water pumps into Egypt. Another grandfather owned a jewelry store in Cairo.

‘It happened overnight’

Personal Testimonies: Egypt

Behar describes his own father, Joseph, as “a dynamic, ambitious, self-made man involved in import-export businesses, real estate and manufacturing.”

The family was very wealthy and employed cooks, nannies and gardeners. They owned a villa on Zamalek, an exclusive island in Cairo, as well as an apartment by the sea in Alexandria, his and her cars, and a membership at the Gezira Sporting Club, which was built by the British and restricted to only a few well-connected Jews.

“The club had 35 tennis courts, seven swimming pools, squash courts, polo grounds, a hockey field, soccer grounds, a racetrack, a golf course, a clubhouse, health club, barber, hairdresser, reading rooms, restaurants, croquet, lawn bowling, card rooms [and] evening entertainment” in an environment where rules were strictly enforced, Behar said.

“Noise and raised voices were not tolerated.”

Behar’s parents both went to the Lycée Francais, while he went to a British private school, Gezira Preparatory School, where students sung Anglican hymns in the morning. The family felt it was important for their children to know English, Behar said.

In 1956, after the Suez Crisis, British instructors in Egypt were replaced by Arab teachers and the curriculum at Behar’s school began to include books that didn’t have Israel on any map and classes that preached against Israel, Jews and Europeans.

The divide between the Jews and Arabs grew, he said.

“We had a European culture and they were Middle Eastern… We spoke French and English. They spoke Arabic. Some Egyptian Arabs were well educated and Europeanized, but they were few,” Behar said.

The anti-Semitic incidents also increased. Behar remembers once being shot in the leg by Arab kids with a BB gun, and he recalls such taunts as “Show me a Jew and I will wring his neck” and “Arabs are real men. You’re only a gentleman.”

Most significantly, Behar remembers when the Egyptian government set aside his grandfather’s assets – land next to the pyramids – and then seized his family’s bank accounts, stocks, bonds and safety deposit boxes.

In February 1952, Behar’s father travelled abroad to establish contacts with relatives who had relocated to Montreal. Furniture containing hidden jewels was sent to Morgan’s Storage under a pseudonym. Slowly, arrangements were put in place that would bring the family to their new home in Canada.

Then one day, Behar’s father came home and told his son, “We’re leaving tomorrow,” and the family became part of the modern Jewish exodus from Egypt.

The transition wasn’t easy. Behar’s mother, Lilian, died one year after their arrival in Canada at the age of 41 from a cerebral hemorrhage.

“It happened overnight,” Behar said. He believes that emotional stress associated with the move contributed to her death.

“Several of her Egyptian-born friends who came to Canada also died in their early 40s,” he said.

Montreal wasn’t an easy place to live, Behar said.

“Mountains of snow covered the streets and sidewalks. Ugly British-style brick buildings. People bundled up like squirrels protecting themselves from the cold.”

Over time, the family adjusted. Behar finished high school and a bachelor’s degree from McGill University before getting an MBA and beginning a career in marketing. His father Joseph became a real estate and mergers and acquisitions broker, and now at 91, lives near Behar in Montreal so his son can look after him. Behar’s brother, Larry, is a lawyer and lives in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and his sister, Josian Argi, lives in Lausanne, Switzerland. —A.M.

Escape from Libya

Personal Testimonies: Libya

On June 6, 1967, the first day of the Six Day War, Walter Arbib looked out at a crowd of angry men carrying knives approaching his home in downtown Tripoli, Libya.

"I saw people I knew who had become part of a mob walking down the main street toward my apartment," Arbib recalled. And then his building was set on fire by the enraged anti-Semitic gang.

Arbib, his mother and a visiting friend used a chair to climb to an attached building and save themselves. After that, Arbib and his mother began planning their escape.

Unfortunately, their first attempt was made on the same day that Egyptian president Gamal Abdal Nasser denounced America and Britain for helping Israel. Arbib and his mother arrived at the airport and handed over their United Kingdom passports to be stamped at the same time the radio announced that the police had spotted Jews carrying British passports.

"A crowd surrounded and began to spit on us. We were saved when the Al Italia manager took us into his office and closed the door," Arbib recalled.

The chief of police, who was a friend of the family, helped them get back into town. After a few days, they tried again and this time successfully left Libya, one of the oldest Jewish communities in the Arab world, for Italy.

Arbib, who is currently CEO of Skylink Aviation Inc., was 26 years old then. He remembers his youth as being relatively calm.

"We had some restrictions. For example, Jews couldn't buy properties or travel together with their families. But nevertheless, life at the time was pretty good because the economy was good," Arbib said, adding that reality really hit him when the mob attacked his home.

> 'After World War II, there were three pogroms directed against Jews in Libya'

After World War II, there were three pogroms directed against Jews in Libya, said Raffaello Fellah, co-chair of the World Association of Jews from Arab Countries.

In a phone interview from Rome, Fellah said 166 Jews were killed and 2,000 more injured during anti-Semitic riots that occurred within the first week of November 1945.

Raffaello's father was one of the Jews murdered during those attacks.

Property belonging to Jews was looted and nine synagogues burned. At that time, the British military administration was controlling the country.

"Part of the first Jewish Brigade of the 8th Army was in Tripoli. However, they were ordered to stay in their closed barracks," Raffaello said.

The second pogrom occurred on the June 17, 1948, immediately after the declaration of the State of Israel.

"This time the Jews were better prepared and only 13 were killed. The British Military Authority immediately stopped the riots."

Personal Testimonies: Libya

The third pogrom was the one that took place during the Six Day War. On that day, 15 Jews were killed – 13 from the same family.

Fellah said Lilo Arbib, a Jewish community leader who died last month, realized the danger and sent a telegram to Libya's King Idris telling him that his sons were being killed and asking him to let the Jews leave.

Arbib told the king that the departure would be temporary and that the Jews would return when things settled down, Fellah said.

Meanwhile, Arbib who had arrived in Italy, spent days and nights as part of a team helping other Libyan Jews find their way into refugee camps and then to Israel. From Italy, Arbib himself also went to Israel, and then to Canada.

This past August, Arbib attended the opening of the Museum for Libyan Jews in Or Yehuda, Israel where he dedicated a poem for his father.

"My father was buried in the Jewish cemetery in Tripoli. The government built a road on top of his grave," Arbib said.

The day Aleppo burned

Personal Testimonies: Syria

In the autumn of 1947, just as the United Nations was calling for the partition of Palestine, synagogues and Jewish homes were being set afire and looted in Aleppo, Syria.

Albert Esses remembers hiding in the home of his father's friend – he can't recall his name – a Muslim who protected the Esses family and watched over their apartment.

One of the synagogues in the old Jewish quarter destroyed that night dated back to the time of King David, Esses said. The synagogue was eventually reconstructed in the 1970s.

Legend has it that Aleppo's Jewish community began when Joab ben Zeruiah, the commander-in-chief of King David's army, built a tower and fortress that became the foundation of the ancient fortifications still in existence in the city.

In 1947, when anti-Jewish riots broke out, "it took hours before any firefighters even bothered to come and contain the blaze," Esses said. "The mayor only intervened when the fire began spreading to the Muslim homes."

Esses was 12 years old at the time. His father worked for the French government. As it became clear that Jews would have a hard time finding work, his family applied for a laissez passer to leave.

"We had to sign a document giving up our property to the government. We didn't have much, so we left as soon as we could," Esses told The CJN.

The same Muslim friend who had hidden them in his home drove the family to the border.

"He told everyone that my father, Shlomo, was his brother," Esses recalled.

Before 1947, many Syrians moved to Israel. But after the 1948 War of Independence, Syrian Jews began leaving for Beirut, Italy and Brazil, Esses said. Later, it became very difficult to leave Syria and the Jews had to be smuggled out.

In 1947, the Esses family chose to move to Beirut, where Shlomo started to work in the currency exchange. Esses' mother, Rachel, stayed at home to raise their children.

Esses studied at the Alliance Israélite Universelle, where he learned Arabic, French, English and Hebrew. He spent two years at the American University and then became a customs broker with two Jewish partners.

"We had an excellent, good life in Beirut – education, work, socially… At that time, Beirut was the Switzerland of the Middle East," Esses said.

After 1957, Jews slowly began leaving Lebanon as well. By 1967/68, most of the Jews left.

Today, with only a handful of Jews left, the government has announced plans to restore the old synagogue, Magen Avraham, and make it into a Jewish museum, Esses said.

From Aleppo to Toronto

In 1960, Esses left Lebanon for Israel. On the way, he stopped in Turkey to visit his uncle who was the CEO of Imperial Chemical Industries. There, he met Rachel, who would become his wife.

She is also Esses' first cousin. Up until recently, it was common for first cousins to marry in the Syrian Jewish community, Esses said.

In August 1973, Esses and his family moved to Toronto. At the time, he thought he was coming for only a few years. But he and his children, Shlomo, Dalia and Daphna, have now lived in Toronto for 26 years and own four kosher restaurants – Café Sheli, Miami Grill, Oasis and Dairy Treats.

Personal Testimonies: Syria

As for memories of Aleppo, Esses said he remembers when two guys used to beat him up every day on his way to school.

"Sometimes they would take my hat and sometimes just my lunch."

Was it because he was Jewish?

"You know," he said.

"It wasn't because they wanted my hat."

Rosh Hashanah Greetings 5764

Leaving Iran

Esther (Moradian) Reuveni was an overprotected seven-year-old Persian girl who walked with a limp when she arrived in Israel with her family in 1951.

Born in Golfhaigon, a small town in the mountainous region of Iran, Reuveni, 59, grew up with one shorter leg as a result of an untreated congenital dislocation of her hips. Growing up for her meant overcoming several battles – physical, social and emotional.

Personal Testimonies: Iran

"I didn't have an easy childhood for many reasons… My parents became overprotective and that made me even more of an invalid," Reuveni said.

Over the years, she integrated into Israeli life, overcoming her own personal struggle to prove she was just the same as everyone else. She got married and worked six days a week in a bank, ending each day cooking, cleaning and raising her three children.

Speaking in Hebrew from her home in Israel, Reuveni told The CJN that her early years were difficult, but as a child growing up in Beit Shemesh, she learned to appreciate and value simple things. Playing with a doll, blowing a whistle or eating a lemon popsicle became treasured experiences.

Before that, Reuveni recalled, life in the small village of Golfhaigan "happened at the banks of the stream that ran through the town. Most of the women would gather there to wash dishes, do laundry, bathe the children…

"Some days, families would get together and simply throw down a rug, grill meat and cool their watermelons in the river."

Reuveni's grandmother, Sultanat Menasheri, ran a home sewing shop, a successful business that provided stability for her family.

"She had 10 sewing machines and all the women in the village knew her because they would all come to learn to sew before they got married," Reuveni said.

As payment for helping the young girls make their sheets, clothes and household supplies, the families would bring crates of flour, nuts and sugar to her grandmother's home, she said. The children would then take little packets, prepared from the surplus, to those in need.

"We would leave packages outside the door so that no one was embarrassed."

The men in the village were usually travelling, Reuveni said. Since families tended to live communally, the women would bake, knit, embroider and talk together in a central courtyard.

Those were good years for the family. If you had sugar, flour, tea, a cow for milk and chicken for eggs, you were "on top of the roof," she said.

Reuveni's brother, Meir More, was born after the family moved to Israel. More, whose first name means "light" – he was born the day electricity arrived in Beit Shemesh – currently lives in Toronto with his family, but is planning to move back to Israel next year.

From riverbanks in Iran to corrugated shacks in Beit Shemesh

Personal Testimonies: Iran

More, 47, said his mother, Sarah, was promised to his father, Chananyah, the day she was born. At nine years old, Sarah was engaged. She was married around the the age of 14 and by the time she was 16, she had already given birth to their first child, Mishael.

"Family legend has it that Sarah had a difficult labour with that baby," More said. Since births took place outdoors, the entire town gathered to help.

"The village policeman came by to shoot his gun off in the air to frighten Sarah in the hopes that she would then give the final necessary push.

"It worked," he said.

More also recalled family stories that portrayed the villagers as being generally happy.

"The Shah was apparently good to the Jews and there was almost no anti-Semitism," he said.

"But my father was a religious Zionist and when he heard about the creation of the State of Israel, he felt compelled to live there."

In 1951, about 15 families made their way to Israel with the Moradians. They travelled by horse and buggy until Turkey and then by trains to a port where the families boarded a ship that took them to Israel, More said.

"In Israel, the families were sent to Beit Shemesh, where they lived in corrugated shacks with no windows in hot, humid conditions," he recalled.

"My father first worked planting trees for Keren Kayemet [Jewish National Fund], then paving roads for the government. Later, he found employment as a laborer in cement and PVC [polyvinyl chloride] factories."

Eventually, the family moved with six other families to an abandoned Arab house in Bat Yam.

Meanwhile, as things became difficult for Iranian Jews under Ayatoullah Khoumeini's rule between 1979 and 1989, the rest of the extended family slowly left.

The last one to come was an uncle, who simply found it too difficult to adapt to what he felt were immodest Israeli western ways. He couldn't bear the sight of miniskirts and halter tops, More said. And while he sent all his children, he only came to Israel about 10 years ago when it became too dangerous to remain in Iran.

On the other hand, More doesn't remember his father ever complaining about the social, cultural or economic hardships he faced in Israel.

"He was simply happy to be in the holy land," More said. For him, "it was a profoundly religious time."

Yemen: the link between Judeo-Arabic traditions

Personal Testimonies: Yemen

The link between Judeo and Arabic culture lies within the Yemeni tradition, says Harvard University professor Ephraim Isaac.

Yemeni Jewish life was grounded in the history of ancient Judaism as we know it from the Second Temple period, and thrived in small remote villages, the president of the Yemenite Jewish Federation of America (YJFA) said in a phone interview from New York.

Since Yemen was so isolated from the rest of the world, the Jewish community developed strong ties to the Arab peoples around them, said Isaac, who is also the director of the Institute of Semitic Studies at Princeton University, a professor of Afro-American studies at Harvard University and founder of the Ethiopian Movement for Literacy, a program that has educated more than two million people in Ethiopia.

Isaac, who says with a chuckle that he will be 100 in 35 years, has been a visiting scholar in ancient Semitic studies at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and is considered to be one of the founders of African American studies programs in the United States.

He said Jews from Arab countries should be used as ambassadors in Middle East peace negotiations because they truly understand and respect the culture and language of the Arab people.

Isaac pointed to a recent Carnegie Endowment for International Peace conference held in the United States, where the grandson of the Imam Yehye of Yemen sat next to the grandson of Rabbi Shalom Gamliel of Yemen, who advised Imam Yehye in the 1930s, as an example of possible dialogue.

The heart of the Judeo-Arab world begins in Yemen and continues in Iraq, Syria, Lebanon, Egypt and, to a lesser extent, North Africa, Isaac said.

"The Jews of Morocco have been exposed to French and western influences," Isaac said.

Born in the province of Walaca in Ethiopia, Isaac was raised by an Ethiopian mother and a Yemeni father, who, like many Yemeni Jews, was an artisan and a rabbi. Trained as a shochet, Isaac's father initially came to Ethiopia from across the Red Sea in Yemen to assist in the kosher meat preparation for the High Holy Days.

Isaac's father, who died at the age of 93 in Israel, used to tell a story about a Jewish Yemeni villager who was arrested on his way to work early one Saturday morning. When the merchant asked the Muslim officer to explain his offence, he was told that a Jewish man belongs in synagogue on Shabbat.

Living link to Jewish past

"My father used to tell me this story to illustrate the deep respect the Muslims in Yemen had for the Jews because both communities were so deeply religious," Isaac said.

As to whether the Jews in Yemen considered themselves second-class citizens, Isaac acknowledges that the dhimmi tax and "prejudices limited personal and social freedom and officially deprived the Jews of equality.

"However, there were some Jews who were also very well off. There were those who were goldsmiths and minted the national currency," he said.

"The truth probably lies somewhere in between these two narratives, because there were times when the Jews and Arabs interacted and had good relationships. It really depended on the particular leader of the time," he said.

Within the community, the women were by and large limited to the domestic domain, Isaac said. Yet some became learned in text and others served as shochetim.

The men, on the other hand, were "the most literate of all Jewish communities when it comes to Bible and prayers. They could recite the entire Torah off by heart. From an early age, the children would gather around the mori and learn to read ancient texts from all directions."

In fact, Isaac recalls stories about Israeli students going to the bathroom during exams to obtain answers to Jewish literature tests from the Yemeni "scholar-janitors."

And a YJFA brochure Isaac pointed out said that when the late Prof. S. Lieberman of the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) was a student living in Jerusalem, he discovered that the Yemeni caretaker in his apartment building could recite whole chapters of Maimonides' Mishnah Torah by heart. Isaac said he still chants the Book of Jonah to himself sometimes when he's driving near his home in New Jersey.

At the JTS library in New York, 30 per cent of Jewish manuscripts are of Yemenite origin, as are 10 per cent of the biblical texts, biblical commentaries and philological works, 40 per cent of Prophets and 45 per cent of Midrash and Midrashic works in the British Library in London, England.

Isaac said outside the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Cairo Genisa, Yemeni manuscripts provide scholars with the most significant source of ancient Jewish literature.

Yemeni Jews, who in 1950 were the first Jewish community in the world to make aliyah to Israel as one group, have also been the greatest contributors to modern Israeli culture, Isaac said.

"The first Israeli singers, Bracha Safira and Shoshana Damari were Yemenite. The first Israeli dance troupe, Inbal, was Yemeni."

Isaac believes it is imperative today to rejuvenate Yemeni Jewish heritage because it "is the only living link to Palestinian and Babylonian Jewish cultures."

He quoted the late prof. S.D. Goitein of the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton University, who once wrote, "Yemenite [Jews]… have always taken their full share in the development of the Jewish religion, so full a share indeed that some believe the Yemenites to be the most Jewish of all Jews." —A.M.

JEWISH REFUGEES FROM ARAB COUNTRIES:

THE CASE FOR RIGHTS AND REDRESS

Prepared by:

DAVID MATAS
and
STANLEY A. URMAN

Prepared for Justice for Jews from Arab Countries

This report was written by, and represents the opinions and conclusions of David Matas, Chair of the Advisory Legal Committee, and Stanley A. Urman, of Justice for Jews from Arab Countries. It does not necessarily reflect the views of the individual members of either the Advisory Legal Committee or the organizations that they represent.

INTRODUCTION

Historically, Jews and Jewish communities have existed in the Middle East, North Africa and the Gulf region for more than 2,500 years.

Jews in substantial numbers resided in what are today Arab countries over 1,000 years before the advent of Islam. Following the Muslim conquest of the region, for centuries, while relegated to second-class status, Jews were nonetheless permitted limited religious, educational, professional and business opportunities.

COUNTRY/REGION	DATE OF JEWISH COMMUNITY
Iraq	6th century BCE
Lebanon	1st century BCE
Libya	3rd century BCE
Syria	1st century CE
Yemen	3rd century BCE
Morocco	1st century CE
Algeria	1st – 2nd century CE
Tunisia	200 CE

The status of Jews in Arab countries changed dramatically immediately before and after the Arab world attacked the new State of Israel in 1948. By way of example, in Syria, as a result of anti-Jewish pogroms that erupted in Aleppo in 1947, 7,000 of the town's 10,000 Jews fled in terror. In Iraq, "Zionism" became a capital crime. Bombs in the Jewish Quarter of Cairo killed more than 70 Jews. After the French left Algeria, the authorities issued a variety of anti-Jewish decrees prompting nearly all of the 160,000 Jews to flee the country. After the UN General Assembly resolution on the Partition Plan, Muslim rioters engaged in a bloody pogrom in Aden and Yemen, which killed 82 Jews. Varying numbers of Jews fled from 10 Arab countries, becoming refugees in a region overwhelmingly hostile to Jews.

Little is heard about these Jewish refugees because they did not remain refugees for long. Of the hundreds of thousands of Jewish refugees between 1948 and 1972, some two-thirds were resettled in Israel at great expense – others emigrated elsewhere – all without any compensation provided by the Arab governments that confiscated their possessions.

Securing rights and redress for Jews displaced from Arab countries is an issue that has not yet been adequately addressed by the international community. In fact, there were more former Jewish refugees uprooted from Arab countries (over 850,000) than there were Palestinians who became refugees as a result of the 1948 war when six Arab nations attacked the fledgling State of Israel. (UN estimate: 726,000)

There is a moral and legal imperative to ensure that justice for Jews from Arab countries assumes its rightful place on the international political and juridical agenda and that their rights be secured as a matter of law and equity.

This Report is based on three fundamental principles: Truth, Justice and Reconciliation.

- The history and truth about the plight of former Jewish refugees from Arab countries must be returned to the narrative of the Middle East from which it has been expunged;

- Compelling evidence supports the call for justice to redress the victimization of Jews who lived in Arab countries and the mass violations of human rights that they were victims of; and

- In the absence of truth and justice, there can be no reconciliation, without which there can be no just, lasting peace between and among all peoples of the region.

THE HISTORICAL NARRATIVE AND THE MASS VIOLATIONS OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Since biblical times, the land of Israel has been a major arena for conflict and wars. Its importance over thousands of years of history traverses many fields, underscored by the fact that the Middle East is:

- Geographically (and militarily) strategic, as a land-link "crossroads" from north to south and east to west (Europe to India; Africa to Asia); and provides a sea lane from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea;

- The birthplace of the world's three great monotheistic religions (Christianity, Islam and Judaism); and

- The cradle of civilization, with a rich heritage in numerous fields; from architecture to music to mathematics to philosophy.

There has been an uninterrupted presence of large Jewish communities in the Middle East from time immemorial. The ancient Jewish communities of the Middle East and North Africa existed some 1,000 years before the Arab Muslim conquests of the these regions – including the Land of Israel – and about 2,500 years before the birth of the modern Arab states.

Over the centuries, through a process of Arabization and Islamicization, these regions have become known as the "Arab world." Yet, non-Arab and non-Muslim minorities, the original indigenous inhabitants, remained as minorities in their own lands.

It is within the last 55 years that the world has witnessed the mass displacement of over 850,000 Jews from the totalitarian regimes, the brutal dictatorships and monarchies of Syria, Trans-Jordan, Egypt, Lebanon, Yemen, Iran, Iraq, Algeria, Tunisia and Morocco.

The displacement of Jews from Arab countries did not happen in a vacuum. It was the result of the repressive responses of Arab regimes and their peoples to the rise of a Jewish nationalist movement (Zionism) and the establishment of a Jewish homeland in the Land of Israel. Beginning in 1947, two populations of refugees – Palestinian Arabs as well as Jews from Arab countries – emerged as a result of the Arab states' refusal to accept the UN Partition Plan.

Then, as now, the international community's response to the plight of these refugees focused primarily on Palestinian Arabs. Virtually ignored in the discussion of Middle Eastern refugees was the plight of hundreds of thousands of Jewish refugees displaced from some 10 Arab countries in North Africa, the Middle East and the Gulf states.

In virtually all cases, as Jews left their country, individual and communal properties were confiscated without compensation provided to rightful owners. There were a variety of lost properties and assets:

i) Personal (e.g. homes, businesses, land, pensions, benefits); and

ii) Assets belonging to the community or collective (e.g. schools, synagogues, hospitals and cemeteries).

Figures as to total losses vary. The World Organization of Jews from Arab Countries' (WOJAC) estimate it is well over $100 billion.

Pattern of Mass Displacement of Jews from Arab Countries

Upon the declaration of the State of Israel in 1948, the status of Jews in Arab countries changed dramatically, as virtually all Arab countries declared war, or backed the war against Israel. This rejection by the Arab world of a Jewish state in their ancient homeland was the event that triggered a dramatic surge in a longstanding pattern of abuse and state-legislated discrimination initiated by Arab regimes and their peoples to make life for Jews in Arab countries simply untenable. Jews were either uprooted from their countries of residence or became subjugated, political hostages of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

In numerous countries, Jews were expelled or had their citizenship revoked. In other states, the reasons that many Jews felt compelled to leave or flee varied by country, individual, community and family. Some of the reasons included: discrimination/anti-Jewish legislation; fear of violence/rioting; Arab collusion with Fascist/Nazi persecution of Jews in North Africa; and the rising tension of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The statistics of this mass displacement are revealing and alarming:

After 1948, since virtually all Arab countries were at war with Israel, many Arab countries began to treat their own Jewish citizens as "enemy nationals." Many governments began to enact officially legislated discriminatory laws against Jews, denying them most basic human and civil rights, including: expropriating their property; removing them from civil service and other forms of employment; subjecting them to countless arrests, physical attacks, torture, and even public executions. All of these sinister acts appear to be part of a discernible pan-Arab pattern to force a mass Jewish displacement from Arab countries.

In a word, state-sanctioned repressive measures, coupled often with violence and repression, precipitated a mass displacement of Jews and caused the Jewish refugee problem in the Middle East. The uprooting of ancient Jewish communities from these 10 Muslim countries did not occur by happenstance. There is evidence that points to a shared pattern of conduct amongst a number of Arab regimes, that appear intended to coerce Jews to leave and go elsewhere, or to retain them as virtual political hostages. These are evidenced from: (a) statements made by delegates of Arab countries at the United Nations during the debate on the partition resolution representing a pattern of ominously similar threats made against Jews in Arab countries; (b) reports on multilateral meetings of the Arab League from which emerged indications of a co-ordinated strategy of repressive measures against Jews; (c) newspaper reports from that period; and (d) strikingly similar legislation and discriminatory decrees, enacted by numerous Arab governments, that violated the fundamental rights and freedoms of Jews resident in Arab countries.

From the sheer volume of such state-sanctioned discriminatory measures, replicated in so many Arab countries and instituted in such a parallel fashion, one is drawn to the conclusion that such evidence suggests a common pattern of repressive measures, if not collusion, against Jews by Arab governments.

By way of example, the following official statements represent a pattern of ominously similar threats made against Jews in Arab countries:

- During the Palestine Partition debate at the United Nations, the Palestinian delegate to the UN, Jamal al-Hussayni, (representing the Arab Higher Committee of Palestine to the UN General Assembly), made the following threat:

"It must be remembered that there are as many Jews in the Arab world as there are in Palestine whose positions… will become very precarious. Governments in general have always been unable to prevent mob excitement and violence."

- In a key address before the Political Committee of the UN General Assembly on Nov. 14, 1947, just 15 days before that body voted on the partition plan for Palestine, Heykal Pasha, an Egyptian delegate, made the following statement:

"The United Nations… should not lose sight of the fact that the proposed solution might endanger a million Jews living in the Muslim countries [emphasis added]. Partition of Palestine might create in those countries an anti-Semitism even more difficult to root out than the anti-Semitism which the Allies were trying to eradicate in Germany… If the United Nations decides to partition Palestine, it might be responsible for the massacre of a large number of Jews.

"A million Jews live in peace in Egypt [and other Muslim countries] and enjoy all rights of citizenship. They have no desire to emigrate to Palestine. However, if a Jewish State were established, nobody could prevent disorders. Riots would break out in Palestine, would spread through all the Arab states [emphasis added] and might lead to a war between two races."

Although Heykal Pasha spoke in his capacity as Egypt's representative to the UN, his references to Jews "in other Muslim countries" and "all the Arab states," was reasonably understood by Jews in Arab countries not as a genuine expression of concern for Jewish well-being but rather as a not-very-veiled pan-Arab threat as to what the future might hold for the one million Jews in Arab countries.

- Shortly thereafter, ominously similar projections appeared once again in a statement by Iraq's Foreign Minister Fadil Jamali delivered at that same United Nations meeting:

"The masses in the Arab world [emphasis added] cannot be restrained. The Arab-Jewish relationship in the Arab world will greatly deteriorate… Harmony prevails among Muslims, Christians and Jews [in Iraq]. But any injustice imposed upon the Arabs of Palestine will disturb the harmony among Jews and non-Jews in Iraq; it will breed inter-religious prejudice and hatred."

The assault on human rights was initiated by his own government, which soon took a series of steps, including discriminatory legislation, against its Jewish population.

Subsequently, there were a number of seminal multilateral meetings among Arab leaders and officials from which emerged additional indications of a co-ordinated strategy of repressive measures to be taken against Jews in Arab countries. Some representative examples include:

- Just two days after the State of Israel was proclaimed, a New York Times headline on May 16, 1948, declared "Jews in Grave Danger in All Muslim Lands. Nine hundred thousand in Africa and Asia face wrath of their foes." An article written by Mallory Browne reported on a series of discriminatory measures taken by the Arab League against the Jewish residents of Arab League member states (including, at that time, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yemen). The Times article reported on a:

"…text of a law drafted by the Political Committee of the Arab League which was intended to govern the legal status of Jewish residents of Arab League countries. It provides that beginning on an unspecified date, all Jews except citizens of non-Arab states, would be considered 'members of the Jewish minority state of Palestine.' Their bank accounts would be frozen and used to finance resistance to 'Zionist ambitions in Palestine.' Jews believed to be active Zionists would be interned and their assets confiscated."

- Another indication that Arab countries were deliberating upon the coerced displacement of Jews from their territories comes from reports of a Beirut meeting of senior diplomats from all the Arab states in late March 1949. By this time, the Arab states had already lost the first Arab-Israeli war. As reported in a Syrian newspaper, participants at this meeting concluded that: "If Israel should oppose the return of the Arab refugees to their homes, the Arab governments will expel the Jews living in their countries." In fact, expulsions did take place in some countries.

The third trend that lends credence to the proposition that many Arab countries engaged in a co-ordinated pattern of shared practices to coerce Jews to leave was the plethora of legislation, decrees and other measures that were enacted by Arab regimes, violating the rights of its Jewish citizens. From the sheer volume of such state-sanctioned discriminatory actions, replicated in so many Arab countries and instituted in such a parallel fashion, one is drawn to the conclusion that such actions were premeditated among the governments involved. Moreover, these state-sanctioned measures, coupled often with violence and repression, made remaining in the land of their birth an untenable option for Jews.

By way of example, the following three Country Reports – on Egypt, Iraq and Libya – describe these unmistakable trends in some detail. Similar repressive legislative enactments and other discriminatory measures were also enacted in other Arab countries including Algeria, Tunisia, Morocco, Yemen, Aden, Syria and Lebanon.

EGYPT

History

Jews have lived in Egypt since biblical times. Israelite tribes first moved to the Land of Goshen (the northeastern edge of the Nile Delta) during the reign of the Egyptian pharaoh Amenhotep IV (1375-1358 BCE).

Over the years, Jews have sought shelter and dwelled in Egypt. By 1897, there were more than 25,000 Jews in Egypt, concentrated in Cairo and Alexandria. In 1937, the population reached 63,500.

In the 1940s, with the rise of Egyptian nationalism and the Zionist movement's efforts to create a Jewish homeland in adjoining Israel, anti-Jewish activities began in earnest. In 1945, riots erupted – 10 Jews were killed; 350 injured, and a synagogue, a Jewish hospital, and an old age home were burned down. After the success of the Zionist movement in establishing the State of Israel, between June and November of 1948, violence and repressive measures by the government and Egyptians began in earnest. Bombs were set off in the Jewish Quarter, killing more than 70 Jews and wounding nearly 200. Rioting over the next few months resulted in many more Jewish deaths. 2,000 Jews were arrested and many had their property confiscated.

In 1956, the Egyptian government used the Sinai Campaign as a pretext to order almost 25,000 Egyptian Jews to leave the country and confiscated their property. They were allowed to take only one suitcase and a small sum of cash, and forced to sign declarations "donating" their property to the Egyptian government. Approximately 1,000 more Jews were sent to prisons and detention camps. On Nov. 23, 1956, a proclamation signed by the Minister of Religious Affairs, and read aloud in mosques throughout Egypt, declared that "all Jews are Zionists and enemies of the state," and promised that they would be soon expelled (AP, Nov. 26 and 29, 1956; New York World Telegram).

By 1957, the Jewish population of Egypt had fallen to 15,000. In 1967, after the Six Day War, there was a renewed wave of persecution, and the community dropped to 2,500. By the 1970s, after the remaining Jews were given permission to leave the country, the community dwindled to a few families.

Jewish rights were finally restored in 1979 after President Anwar Sadat signed the Camp David Accords with Israel. Only then was the community allowed to establish ties with Israel and with world Jewry. Nearly all the estimated 200 Jews left in Egypt (from the original 75,000) are elderly and the once proud and flourishing Jewish community is on the verge of extinction.

Discriminatory Decrees and Violations of Human Rights

(Intended merely as a sampling and not an exhaustive compilation)

The first Nationality Code was promulgated by Egypt on May 26, 1926. Entitled to Egyptian nationality were only those who "belonged racially to the majority of the population of a country whose language is Arabic or whose religion is Islam." This provision served as the official pretext for expelling many Jews from Egypt.

On July 29, 1947, an amendment was introduced to the Egyptian Companies Law that made it mandatory for at least 75 per cent of the administrative employees of a company to be Egyptian nationals and 90 per cent of employees in general. This resulted in the dismissal and loss of livelihood for many Jews since only 15 per cent of them had been granted Egyptian citizenship.

A mass departure of Jews was sparked when Egypt passed an amendment in 1956 to the original Egyptian Nationality Law of 1926. Article 1 of the Law of Nov. 22, 1956, stipulated that "Zionists" were barred from being Egyptian nationals. Article 18 of the 1956 law asserted that "Egyptian nationality may be declared forfeited by order of the Ministry of Interior in the case of persons classified as Zionists." Moreover, the label of "Zionist" was never defined, leaving Egyptian authorities free to interpret this term as broadly as they pleased.

Provision both in the 1956 and 1958 laws permitted the government to take away citizenship of any Egyptian Jew absent from United Arab Republic territory for more than six consecutive months. That this provision is aimed exclusively at Jews is shown by the fact that the lists of denaturalized persons published time and again by the Official Journal contain Jewish names only, despite the fact that there were many non-Jewish Egyptians who stayed abroad for over six months.

Economic Discrimination and Strangulation

(Intended as a sampling and not an exhaustive compilation)

Law No. 26 of 1952 obligated all corporations to employ certain prescribed percentages of "Egyptians." A great number of Jewish salaried employees lost their jobs, and could not obtain similar ones, because they did not belong to the category of Jews with Egyptian nationality.

Between Nov. 1 and 20, 1956, official records reveal that by a series of sequestration orders issued under Military Proclamation No. 4, the property of many hundreds of Jews in Egypt was taken from their owners and turned over to Egyptian administrators. Proclamation No. 4 was carried into effect almost exclusively against Jews; and though a number of Copts and Muslims were also interned, their assets were never sequestered.

Of the published lists of 486 persons and firms whose properties were seized under Military Proclamation No. 4, at least 95 per cent of them are Jews. The names of persons and firms affected by this measure represented the bulk of the economic substance of Egyptian Jewry, the largest and most important enterprises and the main sustenance, through voluntary contributions, of Jewish religious, educational, social and welfare institutions in Egypt.

In addition to the vast sequestration of property and other discriminatory treatment, Directive No. 189 issued under the authority of Military Proclamation No. 4, authorized the Director General of the Sequestering Agency to deduct from the assets belonging to interned persons, 10 per cent of the value of the sequestered property, presumably to cover the costs of administration. Hence, without regard to the question of whether a property was legally sequestered, the Jews of Egypt were being taxed to pay for the machinery of improper sequestration and withholding.

The Jews leaving Egypt were subjected to additional deprivations and inconveniences. A regulation was established which limited Jews leaving Egypt to take with them only travellers checks or other international exchange documents up to a value of 100 pounds sterling per capita. The Bank of Egypt provided Jews leaving the country with instruments specifically drawn on Egyptian accounts in Britain and France, when Egyptian authorities knew full well that those accounts were blocked in reciprocation for the Egyptian blocking of British and French assets in Egypt and were not freely negotiable abroad.

IRAQ

History

Iraq is the modern designation for the country carved out of ancient Babylonia, Assyria, and the southern part of Turkey after World War I.

It is also the place of the oldest Jewish Diaspora and the one with the longest continuous history, from 721 BCE to 1949 CE, a time span of 2,670 years.

By the third century, Babylonia became the centre of Jewish scholarship, as is attested to by the community's most influential contribution to Jewish scholarship, the Babylonian Talmud. Jews had prospered in what was then Babylonia for 1,200 years before the Muslim conquest in 634 CE. Under Muslim rule, the situation of the Jewish community fluctuated. Some Jews held high positions in government or prospered in commerce and trade. At the same time, Jews were subjected to special taxes, and restrictions on their professional activity. Under British rule, which began in 1917, Jews fared well economically, but all of this progress ended when Iraq gained independence in 1932.

In June 1941, the Mufti-inspired, pro-Nazi coup of Rashid Ali sparked rioting and a pogrom in Baghdad. Armed Iraqi mobs murdered 180 Jews and wounded almost 1,000.

Additional outbreaks of anti-Jewish rioting occurred between 1946 and 1949. After the establishment of Israel in 1948, Zionism became a capital crime.

In 1950, Iraqi Jews were permitted to leave the country within a year provided they forfeited their citizenship. A year later, however, the property of Jews who emigrated was frozen and economic restrictions were placed on Jews who chose to remain in the country. From 1949 to 1951, 104,000 Jews were evacuated from Iraq to Israel in Operations Ezra and Nehemiah; another 20,000 were smuggled out through Iran. Thus a community that had reached a peak of some 150,000 in 1947 dwindled to a mere 6,000 after 1951.

In 1952, Iraq's government barred Jews from emigrating. With the rise of competing Ba'ath factions in 1963, additional restrictions were placed on the remaining Iraqi Jews. The sale of property was forbidden and all Jews were forced to carry yellow identity cards. Persecutions continued, especially after the Six Day War in 1967, when many of the remaining 3,000 Jews were arrested and dismissed from their jobs. Around that period, more repressive measures were imposed: Jewish property was expropriated; Jewish bank accounts were frozen; Jews were dismissed from public posts; businesses were shut; trading permits were cancelled; telephones were disconnected. Many Jews were placed under house arrest for long periods of time or restricted to the cities.

Persecution was at its worst at the end of 1968. Scores were jailed upon the allegation of an alleged local "spy ring" composed of Jewish businessmen. Fourteen men – 11 of them Jews – were sentenced to death in staged trials. On Jan. 27, 1969, all were hanged in the public squares of Baghdad. (Judith Miller and Laurie Mylroie, "Saddam Hussein and the Crisis in the Gulf," p. 34).

In response to international pressure, the Baghdad government quietly allowed most of the remaining Jews to emigrate in the early 1970s, even while leaving other restrictions in force. In 1973, most of Iraq's remaining Jews were too old to leave and they were pressured by the government to turn over title, without compensation, to more than $200 million worth of Jewish community property (New York Times, Feb. 18, 1973).

The New York Times (July 28, 2003) reported that there are only 28 Jews left in Baghdad. A once-flourishing Iraqi Jewish community of 135,000 has thus been virtually extinguished (Associated Press, March 28, 1998).

Discriminatory Decrees and Violations of Human Rights

(Intended merely as a sampling and not an exhaustive compilation)

- The first piece of legislation enacted that violated the rights of Jews was the 1948 amendment to the 1938 supplement to the Penal Code of Baghdad. The Baghdad Penal Code set out the provision regarding communism, anarchy and immorality in section 89A(1). The section generally prohibits the publication of anything that incites the spread of hatred, abuse of the government or the integrity of the people. This amendment, enacted in 1948, added "Zionism" to communism, anarchism and immorality, the propagation of which constituted an offence punishable by seven years imprisonment and/or a fine.

In an article that appeared in the New York Times on May 16, 1948, it was reported that: "In Iraq no Jew is permitted to leave the country unless he deposits £5,000 ($20,000) with the government to guarantee his return. No foreign Jew is allowed to enter Iraq, even in transit."

- Law No. 1 of 1950, entitled "Supplement to Ordinance Cancelling Iraqi Nationality," in fact deprived Jews of their Iraqi nationality. Section 1 stipulated that "the Council of Ministers may cancel the Iraqi nationality of the Iraqi Jew who willingly desires to leave Iraq…" (Official Iraqi English translation).

- Law No. 5 of 1951, entitled "A law for the Supervision and Administration of the Property of Jews who have Forfeited Iraqi Nationality" also deprived them of their property. Section 2(a) "freezes" Jewish property.

- There were a series of laws that subsequently expanded on the confiscation of assets and property of Jews who "forfeited Iraqi nationality." These included Law No. 12 of 1951; Law No. 64 of 1967 relating to ownership of shares in commercial companies; and Law No. 10 of 1968 relating to banking restrictions.

LIBYA

History

The Jewish community of Libya traces its origin back some 2,500 years to the third century BCE.

Around the time of the Italian occupation of Libya in 1911, there were about 21,000 Jews in the country, the majority in Tripoli.

In the late 1930s, anti-Jewish laws were gradually enforced, and Jews were subject to terrible repression. Still, by 1941, the Jews accounted for a quarter of the population of Tripoli and maintained 44 synagogues. In 1942, the Germans occupied the Jewish quarter and times were extremely difficult for Jews in Libya although conditions did not greatly improve following the liberation. During the British occupation, rising Arab nationalism and anti-Jewish fervour were the reasons behind a series of pogroms, the worst of which, in November of 1945, resulted in the massacre of more than 140 Jews in Tripoli and elsewhere and the destruction of five synagogues (Howard Sachar, A History of Israel).

The establishment of the State of Israel led many Jews to leave the country. In June 1948, protesting the founding of the Jewish state, rioters murdered 12 Jews and destroyed 280 Jewish homes. Although emigration was illegal, more than 3,000 Jews managed to escape and fled to Israel. When the British legalized emigration in 1949, and in the years immediately preceding Libyan independence in 1951, hostile demonstrations and riots against Jews brought about the departure of some 30,000 Jews who fled the country up to, and after the point when Libya was granted independence and membership in the Arab League in 1951 (Norman Stillman, The Jews of Arab Lands in Modern Times).

Discriminatory Decrees and Violations of Human Rights

(Intended merely as a sampling and not an exhaustive compilation)

- Article 1 of Law No. 62 of March 1957, provided, inter-alia, that persons or corporations were prohibited from entering directly or indirectly into contracts of any nature whatsoever with organizations or persons domiciled in Israel, with Israel citizens or their representatives. Provision of this article also enabled the Council of Ministers to register residents in Libya who were relatives of persons resident in Israel.

- Law of Dec. 31, 1958, was a decree that was issued by the President of the Executive Council of Tripolitania. It ordered the dissolution of the Jewish Community Council and the appointment of a Muslim commissioner nominated by the government.

- On May 24, 1961, a law was promulgated which provided that only Libyan citizens could own and transfer real property. Conclusive proof of the possession of Libyan citizenship was required to be evidenced by a special permit that is reliably reported to have been issued to only six Jews in all.

- Royal Decree of Aug. 8, 1962 provided, inter-alia, that a Libyan national forfeited his nationality if he had had any contact with "Zionism." Forfeiture of Libyan nationality under this provision extending to any person who had visited Israel after the proclamation of Libyan independence, and any person deemed to have acted morally or materially in favour of Israeli interests. The retroactive effect of this provision enabled the authorities to deprive many Jews of Libyan nationality at will.

- With the first law No. 14 of Feb. 7, 1970, the Libyan government established that all property belonging to "Israelis" who had left Libyan territory "in order to establish themselves definitely abroad" would pass to the General Custodian. In spite of the precise wording of the law ("Israelis who had left Libyan territory in order to establish themselves abroad definitely"), the Libyan government started to take possession of property belonging to "Jews" without bothering about the fact that these Jews could not be considered as "Israelis" and had not "established themselves definitely abroad."

- The government decreed the law of July 21, 1970, wherein it states that it wanted to control "the restitution of certain assets to the State." The "Law relative to the restitution of certain assets to the State" asserted that the General Custodian would administer liquid funds of the property of Jews as well as the companies and the company shares belonging to Jews.

Arab Decrees and the Nuremberg Laws on Citizenship and Race

The mass displacement of the Jews from the Arab countries, as described above, has been a flagrant breach of international law. The 1945 Nuremberg Charter made wartime mass deportation a crime against humanity, and the 1949 Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Civilians in Time of War also prohibits deportations and forcible transfers, whether mass or individual.

Decrees and practices discriminating against Jews in Arab countries – particularly denationalization – are eerily similar to the Nazi Nuremberg Laws on Citizenship and Race. And the victims, the Jews, are the same.

The Reich Citizenship Law of Sept. 15, 1935, provided that "A citizen of the Reich may be only one who is of German or kindred blood."

Only citizens of the Reich could enjoy full political rights. The First Supplementary Decree to this citizenship law, of Nov. 14, 1935, provided that only citizens of the Reich could exercise the right to vote and the right to hold public office. The law stated explicitly: "A Jew cannot be a citizen of the Reich. He cannot exercise the right to vote; he cannot hold public office." Jewish officials were retired as of Dec. 31, 1935.

The Nuremberg laws defined a person as Jewish both by ancestry and by affiliation. One of the ways in which a person was considered Jewish was if the person was descended from two full Jewish grandparents and if the person was a member of the Jewish religious community when the law was issued or joined the community later.

The Nuremberg laws violated basic human rights; the right to a nationality; the right to vote; the right to equality. They were damaging in themselves and a signal of the disasters to come. They depersonalized Jews, by saying that they were not legal persons in the eyes of the state.

These laws were unconscionable at the time. After the Holocaust, similar laws with the same target victims are unspeakable.

Today, instead of or in addition to affiliation with the Jewish religious community, denationalization in Arab countries comes from affiliation with Zionism. "Zionist" is often just a code word for "Jewish." Insofar as it has any separate meaning, the meaning is that Jews must denounce and reject some human rights in order to keep others. Jews must denounce and reject the right to self-determination of the Jewish people in order to keep their right to nationality.

Before World War II, Jews in Europe were denationalized because of their ties with the Jewish religion; after World War II Jews in the Middle East have been denationalized because of their ties with the Jewish people. The violation of human rights is as basic, as repugnant, as wrong.

THE RESPONSE OF THE UNITED NATIONS TO THE PLIGHT OF REFUGEES, ARISING OUT OF THE ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT

Overview

From 1947 onward, the response of the international community to assist Palestinian refugees arising out of the Arab-Israeli conflict was immediate and aggressive. During that same period, there was no concomitant United Nations' response, nor any comparable international action, to alleviate the plight of hundreds of thousands of Jewish refugees from Arab countries.

The sole comparison that can be made between Palestinian and Jewish refugees is that both were determined to be bona fide refugees under international law, albeit each according to different internationally accepted definitions and statutes – Palestinian refugees covered by the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees (UNRWA) and Jewish refugees under the statute of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR).

As far as the response of the United Nations to the two populations of refugees is concerned, the similarity ends there. The contrasts, however, are stark:

a) Since 1947, there have been over 681 UN General Assembly resolutions dealing with virtually every aspect of the Middle East and the Arab Israeli conflict;

b) Fully 101 of these UN resolutions refer directly and specifically to the 'plight' of Palestinian refugees.

c) In none of these 681 UN resolutions on the Middle East is there a specific reference to, nor any expression of concern for, the 856,000 Jews living in Arab countries

d) Numerous UN agencies and organizations were involved in a variety of efforts, or others were specifically created, to provide protection, relief, and assistance to Palestinian refugees. No such attention and assistance was forthcoming from these UN agencies for Jewish refugees from Arab countries.

e) Since 1947, billions of dollars have been spent by the international community – by the UN, its affiliated entities and member states – to provide relief and assistance to Palestinian refugees. During that same period, no such international financial support was ever provided to ameliorate the plight of Jewish refugees.

Representations to the UN General Assembly Calling for an International Response to the Plight of Jewish Refugees

It is widely believed that over the last 55 years, the United Nations General Assembly and Security Council have spent more time on the Arab-Israeli conflict than on any other issue.

When the issue of "refugees" is raised within the context of the Middle East, people invariably refer to Palestinian refugees; rarely, if ever, is there a reference to legitimate rights of Jews displaced from Arab countries.

The fact that there is not one recorded UN resolution on Jewish refugees is not due to a lack of trying.

On numerous occasions, the Israeli government, the World Organization of Jews from Arab Countries (WOJAC) and other governmental and non-governmental officials alerted the United Nations, its leadership and affiliated agencies to the problem of Jewish refugees and sought its intervention to ameliorate the plight of Jews fleeing from Arab countries. By way of example:

On Nov. 27 and 30, 1956, then-Israeli Minister of Foreign Affairs Golda Meir wrote two letters to the UN Secretary General "regarding the action taken by the Egyptian government against the Jewish Community in Egypt."

On Dec. 21, 1956, Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., the U.S. Representative to the UN, stated that he shares "concern about reports of the plight of Jews in Egypt." The U.S. made a statement expressing its concern from the rostrum of the UN General Assembly in order to put the U.S. on record as "abhorring such practices as have been alleged."

On Jan. 11, 1957, Philip Klutznick, on behalf of the Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations, wrote to Secretary General Dag Hammarskjöld, urging him to use his "good offices to induce the government of Egypt to desist from the prosecution of a policy… to bring total ruin to the old-established Jewish community of Egypt."

On Dec. 2, 1968, The International League for the Rights of Man, a non-Jewish organization, wrote to Secretary General U Thant calling attention to "situations in Egypt, Syria and Iraq, representing continuing and serious infringements of human rights."

On Oct. 10, 1977, then-Israeli Minister of Foreign Affairs Moshe Dayan addressed the 32nd Session of the UN General Assembly and spoke forcefully on the discriminatory treatment of Jews in Arab countries.

On Dec. 3, 1979, then-Israeli Ambassador Yehuda Blum delivered a speech to the UN during which he described the "dramatic worsening in the attitude of (and treatment by) Syrian authorities towards its Jewish community."

On Nov. 24, 1987, then-Israeli Ambassador to the UN Johanan Bein addressed the 42nd Session of the UN General Assembly and spoke of "the war of aggression unleashed by Arab countries against Israel in 1948" which "brought about an exodus of Jews from Arab lands."

Notwithstanding these and other formal representations, there was not one UN resolution expressing concern about the plight and fate of up to 1,000,000 Jews displaced from Arab countries, nor any ameliorative action undertaken on their behalf by the international community.

Relevant UN Resolutions and Action

The following are the most seminal UN resolutions on the Middle East that could pertain to the issue of Jewish refugees and the concomitant response (or lack of it) by the international community.

UN Resolution 181 (II) (A+B): The General Assembly, on Nov. 29, 1947, in adopting Resolution 181 (II), approved "The Partition Plan" that provided for the termination of the Mandate, the progressive withdrawal of British armed forces and the delineation of boundaries for two states and for the city of Jerusalem. It called for the creation of the Arab and Jewish states not later than October 1st, 1948. By Resolution 181 (II), the Assembly also set up the United Nations Palestine Commission (UNPC) to carry out its recommendations. The adoption of Resolution 181 (II) was followed by outbreaks of violence during which time the displacement of significant numbers of both Palestinians from Israel and Jews from Arab countries began.

UN Resolution 194 (III): On December 11th, 1948, the General Assembly adopted Resolution 194 (III) that was destined to be one of the cornerstones of the Middle East peace process. It was the "road map" of its era and provided a detailed plan for the region. It consists of 15 paragraphs, one of which (paragraph 11) deals with the subject of refugees. In part, it states that refugees wishing to return to their homes and live at peace with their neighbours should be permitted to do so at the earliest practicable date, and that those choosing not to return should be compensated for their property. Unlike Security Council resolutions, this General Assembly resolution was non-binding but Arab government representatives at the United Nations still voted against it.

UN Resolution 237 (1967): After hostilities broke out between Israel and Egypt, Jordan and Syria, and a subsequent ceasefire was secured, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 237 on June 14, 1967. It called upon Israel to ensure the safety, welfare and security of the inhabitants of the areas where military operations had taken place and to facilitate the return of the displaced persons. The governments concerned were asked to "respect scrupulously the humanitarian principles governing the protection of civilian persons in time of war" as enunciated in the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949.

After this latest Middle East conflict, it was clear that the predominant concern of the UN was for the safety of Palestinian refugees. However, this resolution can appropriately be cited as the first official UN recognition that alludes to the plight and potential claims of former Jewish refugees. Then-Secretary-General U Thant sent Nils-Goran Gussing, his special representative to the region, and he stated expressly that the provisions of Resolution 237:

"might properly be interpreted as having application to the treatment, at the time of the recent war and as a result of that war, of both Arab and Jewish persons in the States which are directly concerned because of their participation in that war."

No mention of Jewish refugees but a reference to "Jewish persons," civilians who may require protection in time of war.

In an important precedent, Mr. Gussing, who went to the Middle East primarily to determine Israel's compliance with Security Council Resolution 237, also addressed the plight of Jews in Arab countries.

On Aug. 17, 1967, Mr. Gussing sent letters to the governments of Syria and Egypt, requesting a written report on "the treatment and protection of Jewish persons" in those countries. He stressed that it would be "particularly helpful" to know "how the personal and property rights of such persons had been affected by the recent (1967) war, how many of them might have been and continued to be confined and for what reason, and whether they were free to leave the country in which they are resident." He sent a similar letter to Israel about the status of Arabs in occupied areas.

On Sept. 15, 1967, Mr. Gussing submitted his report to the UN that included a section on "The Question of the Treatment of Minorities." Mr. Gussing reported to the UN General Assembly on his Aug, 29, 1967, visit to Damascus where he discussed the problem of Syrian Jewry with government officials "at some length." He was told that the Syrian government "welcomed the chance to assure the Special Representative that the Jewish minority in Syria were treated in exactly the same way as other citizens." With respect to Egypt, Mr. Gussing reported that he had been rebuffed by government officials in his efforts to determine the condition of Jews in Egypt since the six day June war. He further reported that the Egyptian government "expressed the firm opinion that the Security Council resolution [237] did not apply to the Jewish minority" in Egypt. Nonetheless, Mr. Gussing reported on "persistent allegations that 500-600 Jews had been kept in detention since the beginning of the war…" In his remarks to the General Assembly, Mr. Gussing also referred to reports that "the property of the Jews in Cairo had been confiscated."

Therefore, it cannot be said that the United Nations was unaware of the violations of the rights of Jews from Egypt and Syria. However, whatever concern for Jewish refugees that might have been evidenced as a result of Resolution 237 was short-lived.

One year later, the UN passed Resolution 259, which refers back specifically to Resolution 237, albeit with a significant change in language. Now the UN was only concerned with:

"The safety, welfare and security of the inhabitants of the Arab territories under military occupation by Israel."

No mention of "Jewish persons." The concern for Jews had dissipated. The UN reverted back to form.
